CHILLINGWORTH (WILLIAM), a learned Writer and Divine of the laſt century, was ſon of Mr. William Chillingworth, Citizen, and ſome time Mayor, of Oxford; and was born in St. Martin's pariſh in that city, in October 1602. After he had been educated in Grammar-learning at a private ſchool in that city, he was admitted a ſcholar of Trinity-College, the 2d of June, 1618 (a). June the 18th, 1620, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b); the 16th of March, 1623, he was admitted Maſter of Arts (c); and the 10th of June, 1628, he was elected Fellow of his College [A]. About this time, by the arts and inſinuations of the famous Jeſuit John Fiſher, Mr. Chillingworth was converted to the Romiſh religion [B], and perſuaded to retire to the Jeſuits College at Douay (d). But Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, who was his godfather (e), correſponding with him by letters [C], and preſſing him with ſeveral arguments againſt the doctrines and practices of the Romaniſts, Mr. Chillingworth, who began now to ſee the arguments, by which he had been converted, in another light, left Douay, after a ſhort ſtay there [D], in 1631 (f). Upon his return to England, with [A] ——Fellow of his college.] 'He was then 'obſerved, ſays the Oxford Antiquary (1), to be no 'drudge at his ſtudy, but being a man of great parts 'would do much in a little time when he ſettled to it. 'He would often walk in the college grove, and contemplate; but when he met with any ſcholar there, 'he would enter into diſcourſe, and diſpute with 'him, purpoſely to facilitate, and make the way of 'wrangling common with him; which was a faſhion 'uſed in thoſe days, eſpecially among the diſputing 'Theologiſts, or among thoſe that ſet themſelves 'apart purpoſely for Divinity.' Mr. Chillingworth did not confine his ſtudies to Divinity: he applied himſelf likewiſe, with good ſucceſs, to the Mathematicks (2), and had the reputation of a Poet, as appears from theſe verſes of Sir John Suckling:

[B] He was converted, by John Fiſher the Jeſuit, to the Romiſh religion.] The converſation and ſtudy of the Univerſity ſcholars, in our author's time, turned chiefly upon the controverſies between the Church of England and the Church of Rome; occaſioned by the uncommon liberty allowed the Romiſh prieſts by King James I. and King Charles I. Several of them lived at or near Oxford, and made frequent attempts upon the young ſcholars, ſome of whom they deluded to the Romiſh religion, and afterwards conveyed to the Engliſh Seminaries beyond ſea. Among theſe prieſts was the celebrated John Fiſher (5), who was, at that time very converſant at Oxford; and Mr. Chillingworth being accounted a very ingenious man, he uſed all poſſible means to be acquainted with him. Their converſation ſoon turned upon the points controverted between the two churches; but more particularly on the neceſſity of an infallible living judge in matters of faith. Mr Chillingworth found himſelf unable to anſwer the arguments of the Jeſuit on this head; and, being once convinced of the neceſſity of ſuch a judge, he was eaſily brought to believe, that this infallible judge was to be found in the church of Rome, and that therefore the church of Rome muſt be the true church, and the only church, in which men could be ſaved. He therefore forſook the communion of the church of England, and, with incredible ſatisfaction of mind, embraced the Romiſh religion (6). Mr. Des Maizeaux has given us a letter (7), which Mr. Chillingworth wrote on this occaſion to his friend Mr. Sheldon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in which he deſires him ſeriouſly to conſider the following queries. I. Whether it be not evident from Scriptures, and Fathers, and reaſon, from the goodneſs of God, and the neceſſity of mankind, that there muſt be ſome one church infallible in matters of faith? II. Whether there be any other ſociety of men in the world, beſides the church of Rome, that either can upon good warrant, or indeed at all, challenge to itſelf the privilege of infallibility in matters of faith. After which, he concludes his letter with theſe words; 'When you have applied 'your moſt attentive conſideration upon theſe queſ-'tions, I do aſſure myſelf, your reſolution will be affirmative in the firſt, and negative in the ſecond. 'And then the concluſion will be, that you will ap-'prove and follow the way, wherein I have had the 'happineſs to enter before you; and ſhould think it 'infinitely increaſed, if it would pleaſe God to draw 'you after.'

[C] Dr. Laud—correſponded with him by letters.] Archbiſhop Laud, in his ſpeech before the Lords, on the firſt day of his trial, March 12, 1643, appealed to the letters which then paſſed between him and Mr. Chillingworth, in order to vindicate himſelf from the charge of Popery. 'Mr. Chillingworth's learning 'and abilities, ſays he (8), are ſufficiently known to 'all your Lordſhips. He was gone, and ſettled at 'Dowaye. My letters brought him back; and he 'lived and died a defender of the Church of Eng-'land. And that this is ſo, your Lordſhips cannot 'but know: for Mr. Prynne took away my letters, and 'all the papers which concerned him, and they were 'examined at the Committee.' Theſe letters are ſuppoſed to be loſt. Mr. Prynne, who took away Archbiſhop Laud's papers, purſuant to an order of the Houſe of Commons, kept them till after the Reſtoration; when, by order of the King in Council, they were delivered to Dr. Sheldon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But very few of thoſe papers, which Prynne had publiſhed in ſeveral pamphlets and books, came into the Archbiſhop's hands: and many, even of thoſe which had not been publiſhed, were found wanting; among which were the letters in queſtion (9).

[D] He left Douay, after a ſhort ſtay there.] Mr. Chillingworth was ſoon tired with the company of his new friends at Douay, as appears from the following paſſages of Mr. Lacy, a Jeſuit, who wrote a bitter invective againſt him, after he had publiſhed his book, intitled, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation, &c. 'Had he not made, ſays that 'author (10), ſo much haſt in running back from the 'Catolique, as though he had come thither only to 'fetch fire of faction, he might have acquainted 'himſelf better with the practice of the holy church, 'in this very point of miracles, and relations con-'cerning ſaints.' Again: 'Yet, had the man but 'ſtayed, ſays he (11), to have learned his catechiſme 'among us, he might have knowne the uſe and 'meaning of our ceremonies: now having come into 'the church, as Cato came unto the theater, only to 'go out againe; what meruaile if he returne a ridi-'culous cenſurer of what he only ſaw and underſtood 'not? Such poſt-haſt were hardly tolerable in a ſpie, 'much with the approbation of Biſhop Laud, he retired to Oxford, where he purſued his enquiries into religion with great care and diligence, reading the beſt books, and converſing with the moſt learned men of both perſuaſions; till, at laſt, the Proteſtant principles appearing to him the moſt agreeable to Scripture and reaſon, he declared for them; and, about the year 1634, wrote a paper [E] in confutation of the arguments by which he had been ſeduced; though ſuch was his love of truth, that, even after his return to Proteſtantiſm, he made no ſcruple to re-examine the grounds of it, as appears by a letter he wrote to Dr. Sheldon, containing ſome ſcruples he had about leaving the Church of Rome, and returning to the Church of England (g); which ſeems to have occaſioned the report, that he had turned Papiſt a ſecond time, and then Proteſtant again (h). Nor is it ſtrange, that this ſeeming inconſtancy of temper and judgment, for which our author has modeſtly apologized [F], ſhould expoſe him to the moſt malicious and ill-grounded calumnies [G], as well as to ſeveral diſputes with thoſe of the Romiſh religion. But,

' much leſſe in one who comes to ſee and cenſure.' Elſewhere he ſays (12): ' Would any man think, ' that this man was never Catholique above two ' months at once, who knowes the Jeſuits ſo well?' That Mr. Chillingworth met with a kind and reſpectful treatment from the Jeſuits, during his ſhort ſtay among them, may be inferred from the above-cited author, who ſays (13): ' Indeed he loſt his fellowſhip ' by it (by changing his religion,) but I preſume the ' Catholique would have given him a better, had he ' but held out his yeares probation.' Some Proteſtant writers have indeed inſinuated the contrary; particularly Dr. Fuller, who, mentioning Mr. Chillingworth, tells us (14), ' He was an acute and ſubtil ' diſputant, but unſettled in his judgment, which ' made him go beyond the ſeas, and in ſome ſort was ' conciled to the church of Rome: but, whether ' becauſe he found not the reſpect he expected, ' (which ſome ſhrewdly ſuggeſt) or becauſe his con- ' ſcience could not cloſe with all the Romiſh corrup- ' tions (which more charitably believe) he returned ' into England, &c.' Beſides this groundleſs inſinuation, there are two faults in this narrative: for, firſt, Mr. Chillingworth's going beyond the ſeas was not occaſioned by his being unſettled in his judgment, but, on the contrary, by his being ſettled in his opinion in favour of the Romiſh church; and, ſecondly, he was conciled to the church of Rome, not in ſome ſort, but entirely and ſincerely. Anthony Wood has ſuggeſted the ſame thing in regard to Mr. Chillingworth's treatment by the Jeſuits, beſides ſome other miſtakes, and malicious reports, which we ſhall ſet down in his own words. ' About the ſame time, ſays he (15), ' being much unſettled in his thoughts, he became ' acquainted with one who went by the name of ' John Fiſher, a learned Jeſuit and ſophiſtical diſ- ' putant, who was often converſant in thoſe parts ' (Oxford). At length, by his perſuaſions, and the ' ſatisfaction of ſome doubts which he could not find ' among our great men at home, he went to the ' Jeſuits College at St. Omer, forſook his religion, ' and became a Roman Catholic.' But ' ſo it was, ' that finding not that ſatisfaction from the Jeſuits ' concerning various points of religion, or (as ſome ' ſay) not that reſpect, which he expected (for the ' common report among his contemporaries in ' Trinity College was, that the Jeſuits, to try his ' temper, and exerciſe his obedience, did put him ' upon ſervile duties far below him) he left them in ' the year 1631, returned to the church of England ' (though the Preſbyterians ſaid not, but that he was ' always a Papiſt in his heart, or, as we now ſay, in ' maſquerade) and was kindly received by his god- ' father Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London.' Mr. Chillingworth did not retire to the college of St. Omer, as this writer aſſerts, but to that of Douay, if Archbiſhop Laud, who certainly knew it beſt, is to be believed (16). Neither is it at all probable, what the Preſbyterians ſaid, that Mr. Chillingworth continued ſtill a Papiſt in his heart, after his return to the church of England.

[E] A paper.] This paper is now loſt. It is true, we have a paper of Mr. Chillingworth's on the ſame ſubject; but it ſeems to have been written on ſome other occaſion, probably at the deſire of his friends. It was firſt publiſhed, in 1687, in the Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth (17).

(17) See the remark [I].

[F] His modeſt Apology for this ſeeming inconſtancy of temper and judgment.] There are numberleſs paſſages in Mr. Chillingworth's works, wherein his religious conduct is ſtrongly juſtified. But we ſhall ſelect only the following from his celebrated piece, intitled The Religion of Proteſtants, &c. in anſwer to Mr. Knott's Charity maintained by Catholics, &c. ' I know a man, ' ſays our author (18), ſpeaking of himſelf, that of a ' moderate Proteſtant turned a Papiſt, and the day ' that he did ſo (as all things that are done are per- ' fected ſome day or other) was convicted in conſci- ' ence, that his yeſterdaies opinion was an error, and ' yet thinks hee was no ſchiſmatique for ſo doing, ' and deſires to be informed by you whether or no ' hee was miſtaken. The ſame man afterwards, ' upon better conſideration, became a doubting ' Papiſt, and of a doubting Papiſt a confirmed Pro- ' teſtant. And yet this man thinks himſelf no more ' to blame for all theſe changes, than a travailer, who ' uſing all diligence to find the right way to ſome ' remote citty, where he had never been (as the partie ' I ſpeak of had never been in Heaven) did yet ' miſtake it, and after find his error, and amend ' it. Nay, he ſtands upon his juſtification ſo farre, ' as to maintain that his alterations, not only to you, ' but alſo from you, by God's mercy, were the moſt ' ſatisfactory actions to himſelfe, that ever he did, ' and the greateſt victories that ever he obtained over ' himſelfe, and his affections to thoſe things which in ' this world are moſt precious; as wherein, for God's ' ſake, and (as he was verily perſuaded) out of love to ' the truth, he went upon a certain expectation of ' thoſe inconveniences, which to ingenuous natures ' are of all moſt terrible. So that though there were ' much weakneſſe in ſome of theſe alterations, yet ' certainly there was no wickedneſſe. Neither does ' he yeeld his weakneſs altogether without apologie, ' ſeeing his deductions were rational, and out of ' ſome principles commonly received by Proteſtants ' as well as Papiſts, and which by his education had ' got poſſeſſion of his underſtanding.' Here, we ſee, Mr. Chillingworth was ſo far from thinking ſuch changes of religion ſinful or diſreputable, that he glories in them, and makes them matter of triumph.

(18) Chap. v. § 103.

[G] He was expoſed to the moſt malicious and ill-grounded calumnies.] So, I think, we may very well call the following paſſage in one of Dr. Wood's controverſial Letters to Mr. Bulſtrode. ' Can there be ' any thing more notoriouſly falſe, ſays he (19), than ' the words of Chillingworth, cited by you; I ſee ' plainly, and with my own eyes, Councils againſt ' Councils, a conſent of Fathers of one age, againſt a ' conſent of Fathers of another age; the church of one ' age, againſt the church of another age. If I could ' find what he ſaid here to be true, I would ſoon ' diſcard all Revealed Religion, and would turn ' Deiſt: for I do not ſee any argument that can be ' more for a Deiſt's purpoſe than this; and, if the ' truth were known, he was one in maſquerade; for ' a confirmation of which I can give you a very good ' teſtimony, that at the bottom he was ſuch, notwith- ' ſtanding his book which he writ againſt us. Chill- ' ingworth having an intimate friendſhip with the ' gentleman of the Horſe to the grandfather (as I ' think) of the preſent Lord Montague of Coudrey, ' was aſked by this gentleman (who heard all the ' world extolling Chillingworth for his great learn- ' ing,

[H]. But, in 1635, he was engaged in a work, which gave him a far greater opportunity to confute the principles of the Romiſh Church, and to vindicate the Proteſtant Religion: we mean his Religion of Proteſtants, a ſafe way to Salvation [I], which was

'ing, and particularly in controverſy) as a true and 'ſincere friend, to tell him his opinion freely and 'candidly, which was the true Religion: to which he 'anſwered in ſhort, that he (the Enquirer) ſhould 'keep to the Religion in which he was (which was 'the Roman Catholick) for if there were any reli-'gion, that it was the right, and that if there were 'none, that the worſt that could happen to him was 'but ſo much pains loſt. I do not ſay that theſe are 'the words of his letter, but I remember that they 'were much to this purpoſe. Now it is plain by this 'letter (which I do not doubt you will ſay it is 'feigned) that this great champion of your religion 'was but a ſceptick in religion at the beſt, and what 'moſt of your greateſt men are; for if they can be-'lieve that ſo many learned and holy men have been 'deceived for ſo many ages in matters of this conſe-'quence, have they not reaſon to doubt, that theſe 'latter ages have been deceived ſo too, and ſo conſe-'quently there muſt be very little or no ſecurity of 'the Chriſtian Faith.' Till the original of Mr. Chillingworth's letter, here referred to, is produced (which it has never yet been) we may fairly ſet down this ſtory as a malicious and ill-grounded calumny.

[H] He had ſeveral diſputes with thoſe of the Romiſh Religion.] One of theſe was Mr. John Lewgar, a great zealot for the church of Rome; who was a beneficed Clergyman in Eſſex, but quitted both his religion and preferment, to turn Roman Catholick (20). Anthony Wood pretends (21), he was converted by the force of Mr. Chillingworth's arguments, with whom he had ſeveral conferences, after that gentleman's return to England, about matters of religion. But, if Mr. Chillingworth induced Mr. Lewgar to turn Papiſt, it is ſtrange neither of them ſhould take any notice of it in the letters which paſſed between them. However, Mr. Lewgar, between whom and Mr. Chillingworth there had always been an intimate friendſhip, as ſoon as he heard that Mr. Chillingworth was returned to the church of England, ſent him a very angry and abuſive letter, to which Mr. Chillingworth returned an anſwer full of affection and charity (22). This letter was firſt printed in the year 1662, with this title: Mr. Chillingworth's letter touching Infallibility, 4°. In the laſt page is the Imprimatur of M. Frank, Chaplain to Dr. Sheldon, then Biſhop of London, dated the 5th of Auguſt 1662. It was afterwards inſerted in the fifth edition of Mr. Chillingworth's Religion of Proteſtants, &c. in the year 1684, with this title: Reaſons againſt Popery, in a letter from Mr. William Chillingworth to his friend Mr. Lewgar, perſuading him to return to his mother the church of England from the corrupt church of Rome. It was printed again at the end of the contracted edition of Mr. Chillingworth's Religion of Proteſtants, &c. in 1687, with this title: Out of Mr. Chillingworth's Manuſcript, A Letter to Mr. Lewgar, concerning the church of Rome's being the guide of faith and judge of controverſies. But, notwithſtanding all theſe ſeveral impreſſions, Mr. Graſcome, having met with an imperfect copy of it, inſerted it as a piece of Mr. Chillingworth's never before publiſhed, in the Preface of his book intitled Certamen Religioſum (23), &c. in which he tells us, it was communicated to him by Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, a curious collector of uncommon pieces. The famous Dr. Hickes, though a man of great knowledge in books, thought this piece had been firſt publiſhed by Mr. Graſcome, and as ſuch reprinted it in 1705, in the Appendix to a book intitled, Several letters, which paſſed between Dr. George Hickes and a Popiſh prieſt, &c. in the preface to which, ſpeaking of the Appendix, he ſays, 'The ſecond 'paper is a letter of Mr. Chillingworth, about the 'Infallibility of the church of Rome. I have pub-'liſhed it—becauſe I think it worthy to be read of 'all men, eſpecially by Proteſtants, who, when they 'happen to be aſſaulted publickly or privately by 'Popiſh prieſts, may make this uſe of it, to defy them 'to anſwer this letter, and in the mean time to for-'bear.' Mr. Lewgar could not help being touched with a letter, which ſhewed ſo much love, ſincerity, and moderation. He deſired to ſee his old friend again; and Mr. Chillingworth had a Conference with him about Religion before Mr. Skinner and Dr. Sheldon (24). There paſſed afterwards ſeveral papers between them concerning the pretended Infallibility and Catholicity of the Romiſh church; and we have a paper of Mr. Chillingworth's, intituled, A Conference concerning the Infallibility of the Roman church, &c. which ſeems to contain the abſtract or ſummary of their diſpute (25). We have, in the ſame manner, the ſubſtance of a diſpute he had with Mr. Daniel, or Dan à Jeſu, a Jeſuit, whoſe real name was John Floyd; wherein he diſproves the Infallibility of the church of Rome, by an argument taken from the contradictions which are contained in the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation (26). He had another with a gentleman, whom he does not name; in which he confutes the ſame Infallibility, by proving, that either the preſent church of Rome errs, in offering tapers and incenſe to the Virgin Mary, or that the antient church of Rome did err, in condemning as hereticks the Collyridians for offering a cake to her (27). Beſides the pieces already mentioned, Mr. Chillingworth wrote one to demonſtrate, that the doctrine of Infallibility is neither evident of itſelf, nor grounded upon certain and infallible reaſons, nor warranted by any paſſage of Scripture (28). And in two other papers, he ſhews, that the church of Rome hath formerly erred; firſt, by admitting Infants to the Euchariſt, and holding, that without it they could not be ſaved; and, ſecondly, by teaching the doctrine of the Millenaries; both which doctrines are condemned as falſe and heretical by the preſent church of Rome (29). He wrote alſo a ſhort letter, in anſwer to ſome objections put to him by one of his friends, wherein he ſhews, that neither the Fathers, nor the Councils, are infallible witneſſes of tradition, and that the Infallibility of the church of Rome muſt firſt of all be proved from the Scripture (30). We muſt not forget our author's Anſwer to ſome Paſſages in the Dialogues, publiſhed under the name of Mr. Ruſhworth (31). The occaſion was this: The Lord Digby deſired Mr. Chillingworth to meet Mr. White, the true author of thoſe dialogues, at the lodgings of Sir Kenelm Digby, a late convert to the Church of Rome. The Lord Digby himſelf was there. Their conference turned upon Tradition; and as Mr. White had treated the ſame matter in his Dialogues, which were not yet publiſhed, Mr. Chillingworth, probably at the requeſt of the Lord Digby, ſelected out of them ſome paſſages relating to that ſubject, and confuted them (32). The foregoing pieces were publiſhed together in the year 1687, under the title of Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth, never before printed.

[I] His Religion of Proteſtants, a ſafe way to Salvation.] The whole title is, The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation; or, An Anſwer to a Book intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholiques; which pretends to prove the contrary. By William Chillingworth, Maſter of Arts of the Univerſity of Oxford. Edward Knott (33), the Jeſuit, had put out, in 1630, a little book, intitled, Charity miſtaken, with the want whereof Catholickes are unjuſtly charged, for affirming, as they do with grief, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroies ſalvation. In 8vo. This book was anſwered by Dr. Potter, Provoſt of Queen's College in Oxford, in a piece, intitled, Want of Charitie juſtly charged on all ſuch Romaniſts, as dare (without truth or modeſty) affirme, that Proteſtancie deſtroyeth Salvation. In anſwer to a late Popiſh pamphlet, intituled, Charity miſtaken, &c. 1633. The Jeſuit replied in 1634, under this title: Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintayned by Catholiques. By way of Reply upon an Anſwere lately framed by Dr. Potter, to a Treatiſe which had formerly proved, that Charity was miſtaken *by Proteſtants: With the want whereof Catholiques are unjuſtly charged, for affirming, that Proteſtancy unrepented deſtroyes Salvation. ſwer this Reply: which gave him frequent occaſions to reſort to his moſt ingenious and learned friend the Lord Falkland, at Great Tew, his Lordſhip's ſeat in Oxfordſhire; whoſe curious library, as well as converſation, was of great uſe to him on this occaſion (34). Mr. Knott, being informed that Mr. Chillingworth was preparing an anſwer to his book againſt Dr. Potter, came out with an abuſive piece againſt him, intituled, A Direction to be obſerved by N. N. if hee meane to proceede in anſwering the Booke intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholicks, &c. 1636, 8vo. The Jeſuit's deſign in this pamphlet being to prejudice the publick againſt Mr. Chillingworth's anſwer, he charged him in it with Socinianiſm, the moſt odious imputation he could find, and the fitteſt for his purpoſe (35). Mr. Chillingworth's Anſwer to Mr. Knott was very nearly finiſhed by the beginning of the year 1637; when Archbiſhop Laud, who knew our author's freedom in delivering his thoughts, and was under ſome apprehenſion he might indulge it too much in his book, recommended the reviſal of it to Dr. Prideaux (36), Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford; and deſired it might be publiſhed, with his approbation annexed to it (37). And to Dr. Prideaux were added Dr. Baylie, Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity, and Dr. Fell, Lady Margaret's Profeſſor in Divinity, for the examination of Mr. Chillingworth's book, which was ſoon after put to the preſs at Oxford. Mr. Knott was then lurking about that place, and found means, by bribery, to have the ſheets from the preſs, as they were wrought off (38). The impreſſion of our author's Anſwer to the firſt part of Mr. Knott's book being nearly finiſhed, he acquainted Dr. Baylie with his reaſons for not anſwering the ſecond part; and the Archbiſhop being conſulted thereupon (39), it was agreed, that Mr. Chillingworth, in the Concluſion of his work, ſhould give the reaſons he had for not publiſhing an anſwer to the ſecond part. Accordingly the book was publiſhed, and preſented by the author to the King, with a very elegant, modeſt, and pious dedication; in which we learn this remarkable circumſtance, that Dr. Potter's vindication of the Proteſtant Religion againſt Mr. Knott's book was written by ſpecial order from his Majeſty; and that, by giving ſuch an order, that moſt pious and religious Prince, beſides the general good, had alſo ſome aime at the recovery of Mr. Chillingworth from the dangerous deviation he happened then to be in, by the change of his religion (40). Next to the Dedication were printed, as the Archbiſhop had deſired, the approbations of Dr. Baylie, Dr. Prideaux, and Dr. Fell; who had examined Mr. Chillingworth's book with ſuch rigour and ſeverity, as made him ſay (41), it had paſſed a fiery trial. And Mr. Knott affirmed (42), that ſo many alterations had been made by the cenſors in Mr. Chillingworth's manuſcript, that the book was quite another thing from what it was when firſt drawn up by the author. Anthony Wood, upon the authority of Mr. Cheynell (43), tells us, that Dr. Prideaux, after the examination and correction of Mr. Chillingworth's book, uſed in private converſation to compare it to an unwholeſome Lamprey, by having a poiſonous ſting of Socinianiſm throughout it, and tending in ſome places to plain infidelity and atheiſm (44). Dr. Fuller takes notice of the ſame ſtory, but with this judicious remark (45): A paſſage in my opinion inconſiſtent with the Doctor's approbation prefix'd in the beginning of the book. This Approbation is as follows: Perlegi hunc librum——in quo nihil reperio doctrinæ vel diſciplinæ Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ adverſum, ſed quam plurima quæ fidem orthodoxam egregie illuſtrant, & adverſantia gloſſemata acute, perſpicue, & modeſte diſſipant. After ſo full and expreſs an atteſtation to the orthodoxy of Mr. Chillingworth's performance, is it probable, Dr. Prideaux ſhould afterwards repreſent it, among his friends, as a book full of Socinianiſm, and even Infidelity and Atheiſm? But Mr. Wood was fond of defamatory reports, however ill-grounded, when they concerned any adverſaries to Popery.—— Mr. Chillingworth's Preface is inſcribed 'To the 'author of Charity maintained; with an anſwer to 'his pamplet, entituled A Direction to N. N.' He expreſſes what care and diligence he had employed to make his anſwer unexceptionable; how earneſtly he deſired, before the printing of it, to confer with Mr. Knott, and hear what he could offer in vindication of any one argument in his book; and complains, that, inſtead of agreeing with this fair and reaſonable propoſal, he had uſed baſe and oblique means, in order to deter him from publiſhing his anſwer (46). Then he proceeds to vindicate, firſt, the Proteſtants in general; ſecondly, the Divines of the Church of England; and, laſtly, himſelf, from the calumnies and foul aſperſions caſt upon them in the Jeſuit's pamphlet (47). But, the Jeſuit having excepted againſt Mr. Chillingworth's being a fit champion for the Proteſtant cauſe, becauſe he had often, and even not very long ſince, profeſs'd that he would never ſubſcribe to their thirty-nine Articles (48); and, ſecondly, becauſe he had ſet down in writing, motives, which induced him to forſake Proteſtantiſme, and had never anſwered them: Mr. Chillingworth replies to theſe two objections in the cloſe of his preface (49). The book itſelf is divided into ſeven chapters, in anſwer to ſo many of which the Jeſuit's firſt part conſiſts, which are reprinted with our author's anſwers. In the firſt chapter Mr. Chillingworth aſſerts, that Papiſts are uncharitable in condemning Proteſtants: in the IId, that the Scripture is the only rule, whereby to judge of controverſies: in the IIId, that no Church of one denomination is infallible: in the IVth, that the Creed of the Apoſtles contains all neceſſary points of meer belief: in the Vth, that the Religion of Proteſtants is a ſafer way to Salvation than the Religion of Papiſts: in the VIth, that Proteſtants are not Hereticks: and, in the VIIth, that they are not bound by the charity, which they owe to themſelves, to re-unite themſelves to the Roman Church. This performance of our author's was received with uncommon applauſe; inſomuch that two editions of it were publiſhed within leſs than five months. It has been re-printed ſeveral times ſince the Reſtoration. The firſt edition of it was printed at Oxford in 1638: the ſecond, the ſame year, at London, with the Imprimatur of Dr. Samuel Baker, Chaplain to Dr. Juxon, then Biſhop of London. The third edition came out in 1664, with the licence of Dr. Stradling, Chaplain to Archbiſhop Sheldon. To this edition were added ſome other pieces of Mr. Chillingworth, viz. the Apoſtolical Inſtitution of Epiſcopacy, and nine Sermons, the firſt preached before his Majeſty Charles I. the other upon ſpecial and eminent occaſions (50). The fourth edition came out in 1674; and the fifth in 1684, with the addition of Mr. Chillingworth's Letter to Mr. Lewgar. In 1687, when the nation was in imminent danger of Popery, Mr. Chillingworth's book being looked upon as the moſt effectual preſervative againſt it, Dr. John Patrick, at the requeſt of the London Clergy, publiſhed an abridgment of it; with ſome additional pieces of Mr. Chillingworth againſt Popery, which had not been as yet printed. It came out with this title: Mr. Chillingworth's book, called The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation, made more generally uſeful, by omitting perſonal conteſts, but inſerting whatſoever concerns the common cauſe of Proteſtants, or defends the Church of England: with an addition of ſome genuine pieces of Mr. Chillingworth, never before printed. In quarto. In the Advertiſement Dr. Patrick informs us, that the manuſcript, out of which moſt of the additional pieces were faithfully tranſcribed, was an original of Mr. Chillingworth's own hand-writing, in the cuſtody of the Reverend Dr. Tenniſon, to whom the reader was obliged for their publication. Theſe pieces were publiſhed with this title: Additional Diſcourſes of Mr. Chillingworth, never before printed; with the licence of William Needham, Chaplain to Archbiſhop Sancroft (51). The ſixth edition of Mr. Chillingworth's book was printed in 1704, with the additional Diſcourſes, and the table of contents of the contracted edition. But this impreſſion is very full of typographical errors. The ſeventh edition edition came out in 1719; the eighth in ——; and the ninth in 1727. This laſt edition was prepared from that of 1664, carefully examined and compared with the two preceding editions. The various readings of theſe editions are taken notice of at the bottom of each page, with the words Oxf. or Lond. after them. The tenth and laſt edition is of the year 1742, with the Life of Mr. Chillingworth, by the Reverend Mr. Thomas Birch (52). In 1638, Mr. Knott publiſhed a pamphlet, intituled, Chriſtianity maintained; or, A Diſcovery of ſundry Doctrines tending to the overthrowe of the Chriſtian Religion, contained in the Anſwere to a book entituled, Mercy and Truth, &c. Printed at St. Omer, in 4to. This laſt pamphlet of Mr. Knott's is but a paraphraſe of the firſt: The ſame accuſations are brought over again, and little or no notice is taken of Mr. Chillingworth's anſwers. Mr. Knott himſelf was ſo ſenſible, that this piece could never be looked upon as a ſatisfactory anſwer to Mr. Chillingworth's book, that, in the preface, he promiſes a larger work. The doctrines tending to the overthrowe of the Chriſtian Religion, which he imputes to Mr. Chillingworth, are theſe: 1. That fayth neceſſary to Salvation is not infallible, the grounds of which doctrine, he ſays, lead to Atheiſme. 2. That the aſſurance we have of Scriptures is but moral. 3. That the Apoſtles were not infallible in their writings, but erred with the whole Church of their time. 4. That his principles are injurious to the miracles of our Saviour and his Apoſtles. 5. That by reſolving faith into reaſon, he deſtroyes the nature of faith, and beliefe of all Chriſtian verities. 6. That his doctrine is deſtructive of the theologicall virtues of Chriſtian hope and charity. 7. That it takes away the grounds of rational diſcourſe. 8. That it opens a way to deny the bleſſed Trinity, and other high myſteries of the Chriſtian faith. 9. That it layes grounds to be conſtant in no religion. 10. And laſtly, That it provides for the impunity and preſervation of whatſoever damnable error againſt Chriſtian faith. Mr. Knott dedicated this piece to the King. There is ſubjoined to it a little piece, printed the ſame year, and at the ſame place, under the title of, Motives maintained, or, A Reply unto Mr. Chillingworth's Anſwere to his own motives of his converſion to Catholicke Religion. Mr. Wood did not know, that Mr. Knott was the author of this pamphlet: if he had, he would undoubtedly have named him; whereas he only deſcribes the author by the letters I. H. (53), which are at the bottom of the dedication to the King. But Mr. Knott had uſed the ſame initials at the end of his dedication to that Prince, prefixed to his Charity maintain'd, &c. The next pamphlet againſt Mr. Chillingworth was printed likewiſe at St. Omer, with this title; The Church conquerant over human wit, or, The Churches Authority demonſtrated by M. William Chillingworth (the proctour for wit againſt her) his perpetual contradictions, in his booke entituled The Religion of Proteſtants, &c. 4to. The author was John Floyd the Jeſuit (54); who publiſhed, in 1639, by way of Appendix to this piece, another, intitled, The totall Summe, or, No danger of Damnation unto Roman Catholiques for any errors in faith, &c. 4to. The third and laſt pamphlet againſt Mr. Chillingworth's book was printed in 1639, (probably at St. Omer) under the title of The Judgment of an Univerſity man concerning Mr. William Chillingworth his late pamphlet (55), in anſwer to Charity maintain'd, 4to. The author of it was Mr. William Lacy, a Jeſuit, who, at the time of writing it, lived at Oxford (56). At the ſame time was printed a ſequel to this piece, by the ſame hand, under the title of Heautomachia, Mr. Chillingworth againſt himſelf. But our author's performance was not only attacked in his life-time, but even nine years after his death, by his old antagoniſt Mr. Knott, who, as, in his laſt pamphlet, he had charged him with Socinianiſm, ſo, in a book publiſhed in 1652, he charges him with Infidelity: for he entitled it, Infidelity unmaſked: or, The Confutation of a Booke publiſhed by Mr. William Chillingworth, under this title: The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation. Printed at Ghent, in 4to (57).

[K] He refuſed to ſubſcribe the Thirty-nine Articles.] Mr. Chillingworth, conſidering, that, by ſubſcribing the articles, he muſt not only declare willingly and ex animo, that every one of the Articles is agreeable to the word of God, but alſo that the Book of Common Prayer contains nothing contrary to the word of God; that it may lawfully be uſed; and that he himſelf would uſe it; and conceiving, at the ſame time, that, both in the Articles, and in the Book of Common Prayer, there were ſome things repugnant to the Scripture, or that were not lawful to be uſed, he fully reſolved to loſe for ever all hopes of preferment, rather than comply with the ſubſcription required (58). One of his chief objections to the Common-Prayer related to the Athanaſian Creed; the damnatory clauſes of which he looked upon as contrary to the word of God. Another objection concerned the Fourth Commandment; which, by the prayer ſubjoined to it, Lord, have mercy upon us, &c. appeared to him to be made a part of the Chriſtian Law, and conſequently to bind Chriſtians to the obſervation of the Jewiſh Sabbath (59). See, in Mr. Des Maizeaux (60), a letter, which he wrote upon this occaſion, to his good friend Dr. Sheldon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury. It ſeems there paſſed ſeveral letters between our author and Dr. Sheldon upon this ſubject. For Mr. Chillingworth being now intent upon a full enquiry into the ſenſe of the Articles, every ſtep afforded him new ſcruples. Thus he objected, 1. To the XXth Article, importing, that the Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controverſies of Faith. 2. To the XIVth article, that voluntary works, beſides over and above God's commandments, which they call works of ſupererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety, &c. which ſeemed to him to condemn the doctrine of Evangelical counſels, maintained by the Fathers, and by ſeveral eminent Divines of the Church of England, as Biſhop Andrews, Biſhop Morton, Biſhop Mountague, &c. 3. To the XXXIſt Article, that the offering of Chriſt once made, &c. 4. To the XIIIth Article, that works done before the grace of Chriſt, &c. which ſeemed to him to confine God's grace within too narrow bounds, and to exclude from ſalvation the moſt virtuous among the Pagans. Laſtly, he objected to the Articles in general, as an impoſition on men's conſciences, much like the authority aſſumed by the Church of Rome (61). Theſe ſcruples of our author, about ſubſcribing the Articles, furniſhed his antagoniſt, the Jeſuit (62), with one objection againſt him, as an improper champion for the Proteſtant cauſe. To this Mr. Chillingworth anſwers, in the cloſe of his Preface to the Religion of Proteſtants, &c. that, 'though he does not hold the 'doctrine of all Proteſtants abſolutely true—yet he 'holds it free from all impiety, and from all error 'deſtructive of ſalvation, or in itſelf damnable. And 'this, he thinks, in reaſon, may ſufficiently qualify 'him for a maintainer of this aſſertion, that Proteſtancy deſtroys not ſalvation.' Then he adds this remarkable declaration: 'For the Church of England, 'I am perſuaded, that the conſtant doctrine of it is 'ſo pure and orthodox, that whoſoever believes it, 'and lives according to it, undoubtedly he ſhall be 'ſaved; and that there is no error in it, which may 'neceſſitate or warrant any man to diſturb the peace, 'or renounce the communion of it. This, in my 'opinion, is all intended by ſubſcription; and thus 'much if you conceive me not ready to ſubſcribe, 'your charity, I aſſure you, is much miſtaken (*).' Mr. Chillingworth expreſſes here, not only his readineſs to ſubſcribe, but alſo what he conceives to be the ſenſe and intent of ſuch a ſubſcription; which he now takes to be a ſubſcription of peace or union, and not of belief or aſſent, as he formerly thought it was. And, as he did, within a few months, actually ſubſcribe, we have reaſon to believe he did it in the ſame ſenſe; eſpecially if we conſider, that this was alſo the ſenſe of Archbiſhop Laud (63), with which Mr.

removed by the arguments of his good friend Dr. Sheldon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury (l): for, being promoted to the Chancellorſhip of Saliſbury, with the Prebend of Brixworth in Northamptonſhire annexed, the 20th of July, 1638, he complied with the uſual ſubſcription [L]. About the ſame time, he obtained the Maſterſhip of Wigſtan's Hoſpital, in Leiceſter (m). In 1640, Mr. Chillingworth was deputed, by the Chapter of Saliſbury, as their Proctor to the Convocation, which met with the Parliament, and was opened the 14th of April (n) [M]. He was likewiſe deputed to the Convocation, which met the ſame year with the new Parliament, and was opened the 4th of November (o). He was zealouſly attached to the Royal party; and, in Auguſt, 1643, was preſent, in the King's army, at the ſiege of Gloceſter, where he adviſed and directed the making certain engines for aſſaulting the town [N], after the manner of the Roman Teſtudines cum pluteis (p). Soon after, having accompanied the Lord Hopton, General of the King's forces in the weſt, to Arundel-Caſtle in Suſſex, and chuſing to repoſe himſelf in that garriſon, on account of an indiſpoſition occaſioned by the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, he was there taken priſoner, the 9th of December, 1643, by the Parliament forces under the command of Sir William Waller, who obliged the caſtle to ſurrender (q). But his illneſs increaſing, and not being able to go to London with the garriſon, he obtained leave to be conveyed to Chicheſter; where he was lodged in the Biſhop's palace, and, after a ſhort illneſs, died [O], ſome time in the month of January,

Mr. Chillingworth could not be unacquainted; and of Dr. Sheldon (64), who laboured to convince him of it, and was, no doubt, the perſon that brought him at laſt into it. Dr. Bennet, indeed, in his Eſſay on the XXXIX Articles (65), undertakes to prove, from the foregoing paſſage of Mr. Chillingworth, that he was of opinion, that a ſubſcription of belief or aſſent to the articles is required of the Clergy. But, beſides the plain import of our author's words, it may be obſerved, that the Romiſh controverſiſts have always underſtood Mr. Chillingworth's ſenſe of ſubſcription to be as we have repreſented it, and have charged it upon him as a novelty he had introduced into the Church of England (66). Arbiſhop Sancroft, and ſeveral other Divines of the Church of England, have concurred in opinion with Mr. Chillingworth, that her articles are not articles of belief and aſſent, but of peace and union, and conſequently may be ſubſcribed as ſuch.

[L] He complied with the uſual ſubſcription.] He did it in the following words, as appears from the ſubſcription-book of the Church of Saliſbury: Ego Gulielmus Chillingworth, Clericus, in Artibus Magiſter, ad Cancellariatum Eccleſiæ Cathedralis beatæ Mariæ Sarum, una cum Præbenda de Brixworth alias Brickleſworth in comitatu Northampton, Petriburgenſis Diocæſeos in eadem Eccleſia fundata & eidem Cancellariatui annexa, admittendus & inſtituendus, omnibus hiſce articulis & ſingulis in iiſdem contentis volens & ex animo ſubſcribo, & conſenſum meum iiſdem præbeo; 20 die Julii 1638. GULIELMUS CHILLINGWORTH. Hence it appears, that Mr. Chillingworth did actually ſubſcribe, and that in the legal form: both of which have been queſtioned by ſeveral perſons. Mr. Knott affirms (67), that Mr. Chillingworth never ſubſcribed the Articles; and the Biſhop of Bangor (afterwards (†) Biſhop of Wincheſter) concludes (68), upon the ſame falſe ſuppoſition, that Mr. Chillingworth's enjoying a preferment in the Church, without ſubſcribing, was an effect of the particular favour, which the churchmen of thoſe days had for him, as a convert from the Church of Rome.

[N] He adviſed and directed the making certain engines, for aſſaulting the town of Gloceſter.] Mr. Ruſhworth's account of this matter is as follows (70):

(70) Ibid. vol. ii. ann. 1643.

'The King's forces, by the direction of Dr. Chilling-
'worth, had provided certain engines, after the man'ner of the Roman Teſtudines cum pluteis, wherewith
'they intended to aſſault the city between the ſouth
'and weſt gates: They ran upon cart-wheels, with a 'blind of planks muſket-proof, and holes for four 'muſqueteers to play out of, placed upon the axle-
'tree, to defend the muſqueteers, and thoſe that
'thruſt it forwards, and carrying a bridge before it:
'the wheels were to fall into the ditch, and the end
'of the bridge to reſt upon the town's breaſt-work, ſo
'making ſeveral compleat bridges to enter the city.'
But, before the effect of Mr. Chillingworth's machines could be proved, the ſiege was raiſed by the approach of the Earl of Eſſex's forces. That Mr. Chillingworth was preſent at the ſiege of Gloceſter, is farther confirmed by a letter of Biſhop Barlow's, in anſwer to one from a friend, who had quoted Mr. Corbet's (‖) Relation of the ſiege of Gloceſter, in which, that writer mentions Mr. Chillingworth very unworthily, calling him the Jeſuitical Doctor Chillingworth. The Biſhop's words are (71): 'For Mr. Chillingworth, none ever
'queſtioned his loyalty to his King. What Corbet
'(in his book you mention) writes of him, that he 'was in the ſiege of Gloceſter, in the King's army,
'aſſiſting it to take the city, is a great commendation
'of his loyalty and truth: for I know Mr. Chilling-
'worth was there in the ſiege (but whether as a Chap'lain, or Aſſiſtant only, I know not). For going
'thither to ſee Sir William Walter my good friend,
'who was a commander there, I did alſo ſee Mr.
'Chillingworth among the commanders there.'

[O] His death.] We have a very particular account of Mr. Chillingworth's ſickneſs and death, written by his great adverſary Mr. Cheynel, who accidentally met him in Arundel-Caſtle, and frequently viſited him at Chicheſter till he died. It was at the requeſt of this gentleman, that our author was removed to Chicheſter. Here Mr. Cheynel attended him conſtantly, and behaved towards him with as much charity and compaſſion, as his rigid orthodoxy would permit. And no doubt, it was out of a deſire to ſhew his zeal in that reſpect, as well as his entire devotion to the Parliament, that he publiſhed his account of Mr. Chillingworth; which he intituled, Chillingworthi Noviſſima: Or, The ſickneſſe, hereſy, death and buriall of William Chillingworth (in his own phraſe) *Clerk of Oxford, and, in the conceit of his fellow-ſoldiers, the Queen's arch-engineer, and grand-intelligencer. Set forth in a letter to his eminent and learned friends: A relation of his apprehenſion at Arundel, a diſcovery of his errors in a briefe catechiſme, and a ſhort Oration at the buriall of his heretical book. 'Dean of Sarum; Sheldon, Warden of All-Soules; 'Potter, Provost of Queene's; and Morley, Canon of 'Christ Church.' Then comes the Relation itself, with a new title, no less curious than the first: A briefe and plaine Relation of Mr. Chillingworth's sicknesse, death, and buriall; together with a just censure of his work, by a discovery of his errors collected out of his book, and framed into a kind of atheisticall Catechisme, fit for Racovia or Cracovia; and may well serve for the instruction of the Irish, Welsh, Dutch, French, Spanish, Army in England, and especialy for the black Regiment at Oxford. The whole piece is a most ludicrous, as well as melancholy, instance of fanaticism and religious madness. But, as we cannot reasonably suspect the truth of the most material passages it contains, we may learn from it, that Mr. Chillingworth was attended, during his sickness, and provided with all necessaries, by one Lieutenant Golledge, and his wife Christobel, at the command of the Governor of Chichester: that, at first, he refused the assistance of Sir William Waller's Physician, but afterwards was persuaded to admit his visits, though his distemper was too far gone to leave any hope of his recovery: that his indisposition was increased by the abusive treatment he met with from most of the officers, who were taken prisoners with him in Arundel Castle, and who looked upon him as a spy, set over them and their proceedings: and that, during his whole sickness, he was often teazed by Mr. Cheynell himself, and by an officer of the garrison of Chichester, with impertinent questions and disputes (72). If this be a true account, as most probably it is, the Earl of Clarendon was misinformed in relation to Mr. Chillingworth's death. For, after having observed, that he was taken prisoner in Arundel Castle, he adds (73): 'As soon as his 'person was known, which would have drawn reve- 'rence from any noble enemy, the Clergy that at- 'tended that army prosecuted him with all the 'inhumanity imaginable; so that, by their barbarous 'usage, he died within a few days; to the grief of all 'that knew him, and of many who knew him not, 'but by his book, and the reputation he had with 'learned men.' From whence it may be inferred, that the Noble Historian did not know, or had forgotten, that Mr. Chillingworth was sent to Chichester; but believed, that he died in Arundel Castle, within a few days after the taking of it by Sir William Waller. Mr. Wood, who had before him Mr. Cheynell's Relation, tells us (74), the Royal party in Chichester looked upon the impertinent discourses of Mr. Cheynell to our author as a shortning of his days.

[P] He died some time in the month of January.] It may be thought strange by those, who are unacquainted with the many defects in history, that no body as yet has settled the exact day of Mr. Chillingworth's death. Anthony Wood (75) says, he gave way to fate on the 24th of January, or thereabouts, but he quotes no authority for it. Dr. Walker, who has taken almost his whole account of our author from Wood, yet affirms (76), that his death happened on the 20th of January: but why he differs from the Oxford Antiquary, he does not tell us. Le Neve says (77), Mr. Chillingworth died the 20th of January, or thereabouts. But Mr. Des Maizeaux, from several circumstances in Mr. Cheynell's Narrative, has made it highly probable, that he died on Tuesday the 30th of January 1643 (78).

[Q] He was buried at Chichester.] We learn from the author of the Relation above-mentioned (79), that the Presbyterian party were unwilling, at first, to allow Mr. Chillingworth Christian burial, but afterwards consented that he should be buried by those of his own persuasion; which was accordingly performed in the Cathedral Church, most of the Royal Party of that city attending his body to the grave. Here Mr. Cheynell gave a new and uncommon instance of his zeal and orthodoxy. For he met the Malignants, as he calls them, at the place of interment, with Mr. Chillingworth's book in his hand, which, after a ridiculous and fanatical speech, he flung into the grave, to rot with it's author, and see corruption. It may serve to amuse the reader, if we transcribe here Mr. Cheynell's whimsical lamentation over Mr. Chillingworth, in Scripture phrase. 'Howle ye firre 'trees, for a cedar is fallen: lament, ye sophisters, for 'the master of sentences (shall I say) or fallacies is 'vanished: wring your hands, and beat your breasts, 'yee Antichristian Engineers, for your arch-engineer 'is dead, and all his engines buried with him. Ye 'daughters of Oxford, weep over Chillingworth, for 'he had a considerable and hopeful project how to 'clothe you and himself in scarlet and other delights. 'I am distressed for thee, my brother Chillingworth '(may his executrix (*) say) very pleasant hast thou () His sister. 'been unto me, thy love to me was wonderful, passing 'the love of father, husband, brother. O how are the 'mighty fallen, and the weapons, nay engines, of 'warre perished! O tell it not in Gath, that he who 'raised a battery against the Pope's chaire, that he 'might place reason in the chaire instead of Antichrist, 'is dead and gone: publish it not in the streets of 'Askelon, that he who did at once batter Rome, and 'undermine England, the reforming Church of 'England, that he might prevent a Reformation, is 'dead; lest if you publish it, you puzzle all the 'Conclave, and put them to consider, whether they 'should mourn or triumph.'

[R] His Sermons.] They were printed together in the year 1664, with this title: Nine Sermons: the first preached before his Majesty King Charles the First: the other eight upon special and eminent occasions. The first of these discourses, preached before the King, at Oxford, on a publick fast day, was published at Oxford, by his Majesty's command, after the author's death in 1644; and was the first sermon of our author's printed before the Restoration. The publisher of these Sermons justly observes, that they were fitted by the author to the congregations to which he was to speak, and intended only for the benefit of hearers, not of readers. But yet a judicious reader will soon perceive, that they come from a masterly hand. He will find in them a noble simplicity, attended with sublime and exalted thoughts, with an unfeigned zeal for the glory of God, and the good of men's souls.

[S] His Tract in defence of Episcopacy.] The design of this piece was to shew, that Episcopacy is not repugnant to the government settled in the Church for perpetuity by the Apostles. The occasion was this: Dr. Morton, Bishop of Durham, having composed a treatise, intitled, The Judgment of Protestant Divines, of remote Churches, as well such as were the first reformers of religion, as others after them, in behalfe of episcopal degree in the Church; his manuscript was sent to Archbishop Usher, who was then at Oxford; and he published it without the author's name to it, and knowledge of it (80), under the title of Confessions and Proofes of Protestant Divines of reformed Churches; that Episcopacy is in respect of the office according to the word of God, and in respect of the use the best. The learned Primate added to it a brief treatise of his own, with his name prefixed to it, touching the original of Bishops and Metropolitans. And, in order to complete that collection, Mr. Chillingworth furnished him with the aforesaid tract; which being subjoined to the other two, as a conclusion, was intitled, The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, deduced out of the premises by W. C. This little piece was printed by itself in 1644, in 4to, with this title: The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy; but without the author's name. It was again printed in 1660, with a Speech of my Lord Falkland concerning Episcopacy: and here our author's tract is intitled, The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, demonstrated by Mr. William Chillingworth. This performance of our author's was attacked in 1707, by Mr. Alexander Lauder, a Scotch Divine, in a book intitled, The antient Bishops considered, both with respect to the extent of their jurisdiction, and nature of their power: In answer to Mr. Chillingworth and others.

[U] The opinions of ſome eminent writers concerning Mr. Chillingworth.] We begin with Archbiſhop Tillotſon, who, in his Sermon on The Efficacy, &c. of Divine Faith (84), ſays: 'I know not how it comes 'to paſs, whether through the artifice of the Popiſh 'party——or through the ignorance of too many 'well-meaning Proteſtants; I ſay, I know not how 'it comes to paſs, but ſo it is, that every one that of'fers to give a reaſonable account of his faith, and 'to eſtabliſh religion upon rational principles, is pre'ſently branded for a Socinian; of which we have 'a ſad inſtance in that incomparable perſon Mr. 'Chillingworth, the glory of this Age and Nation; 'who, for no other cauſe, that I know of, but his 'worthy and ſucceſsful attempts to make the Chriſ'tian Religion reaſonable, and to diſcover thoſe firm 'and ſolid foundations, upon which our Faith is built, 'hath been requited with this black and odious cha'racter. But if this be Socinianiſm, for a man to 'enquire into the grounds and reaſons of the Chriſtian 'Religion, and to endeavour to give a ſatisfactory 'account why he believes it, I know no way but that 'all conſiderate inquiſitive men, that are above fancy 'and enthuſiaſm, muſt be either Socinians or Athe'iſts.' Mr. Locke had a high value for Mr. Chillingworth, and recommends the reading of his works, in ſeveral of his pieces. Particularly in his tract, containing Some Thoughts concerning Reading and Study for a Gentleman, after having obſerved, that the art of ſpeaking well conſiſts chiefly in two things, perſpicuity and right reaſoning, and propoſed Dr. Tillotſon as a pattern of the former, he adds (85): 'Be'ſides perſpicuity, there muſt be alſo right reaſon'ing; without which perſpicuity ſerves but to ex'poſe the ſpeaker. And for attaining of this, I 'ſhould propoſe the conſtant reading of Chilling'worth, who, by his example, will teach both per'ſpicuity, and the way of right reaſoning, better 'than any book that I know; and therefore will de'ſerve to be read upon that account over and over 'again; not to ſay any thing of his argument.' Biſhop Barlow, in a letter to one of his friends, who had written to him for his judgment, wherein Mr. Chillingworth's peculiar excellency above other writers conſiſted, returns the following anſwer (86): 'You deſire 'to know wherein Mr. Chillingworth's excellency, 'above other writers, did conſiſt? So that you ſeem 'to take it for granted, that he has an excellency (if 'not above all, yet) above many, or moſt writers; 'and I think ſo too. But then the caſe muſt be cau'tiouſly ſtated; for his excellency we ſpeak of, can'not conſiſt in any extraordinary knowledge he had 'of Antiquity (ſacred or civil) of Councils and Fa'thers, or learned men's animadverſions upon them; 'nor in any great ſkill he had in ſeveral Tongues and 'Languages, &c. But his excellency, wherein he 'excelled many (if not moſt) writers, did ariſe from, 'and conſiſt in his Logick, both natural, and (by ex'ceeding great induſtry) acquired.—But that Logick, 'in which Mr. Chillingworth's excellency did prin'cipally conſiſt, was his acquired Logick: he induſ'triouſly ſtudied it, finding the exceeding uſe of it, 'eſpecially in controverſies of religion. Logick (and 'that only) makes a man to write ſo, that his argu'ments ſhall be, 1. Conſequent. 2. Evident. For 'that (and that only) enables a writer really to know, 'whether the premiſes do indeed infer the conclu'ſion; or otherwiſe are falſe, or fallacious, and ſo'phiſtical, and not truly logical and concluding ar'guments. And for this Mr. Chillingworth (after 'an induſtrious and diligent reading Ariſtotle's and 'Crakenthorp's Logick, who were beſt able to inſtruct 'him) was of greater ability to judge truly, than moſt '(if not all) the writers I have yet met with. Be'ſides, Mr. Chillingworth, in all his diſputes againſt 'Popery, draws his arguments, not from the Fathers 'or Councils (though in ſeveral things they may be 'of good uſe, though they be not infallible) but 'from the ſacred Scriptures; which being of divine 'authority and infallible, are a ſure and juſt ground 'of that confidence we are ſpeaking of.' We ſhall only add the following obſervation of Biſhop Hare, in relation to the reading of our author. 'Mr. 'Chillingworth, ſays he (87), is certainly a good rea'ſoner, and may be read with much advantage: but 'I fear the reading of him by young Divines hath 'had one great inconvenience: They ſee little ſhew 'of reading in him, and from thence are induced to 'think, there is no neceſſity of learning, to make a 'good Divine; nay, that if he had been more a 'ſcholar, he had been a worſe reaſoner; and there'fore not to ſtudy the antient writers of the Church, 'is one ſtep to the being Chillingworths themſelves: 'I fear, I ſay, the reading Mr. Chillingworth in their 'firſt years has had this influence, to make them 'think, that good parts and good ſenſe would do 'without learning, and that learning is rather a 'prejudice than an improvement of them. But 'tis 'a great miſtake to judge of a man's learning by the 'ſhew that is made of it. Mr. Chillingworth had 'ſtudied hard, and digeſted well what he read; and 'ſo muſt they who hope to write as well, and be as 'much eſteemed.' B.

 [There are few things which have been deemed more curious in Chillingworth's life than his letter to Dr. Sheldon, concerning ſubſcribing to the articles of the church of England, and of which ſome account is given in note [K]. This letter hath not unfrequently been referred to in the controverſies relative lative to ſubſcription, and has been thought worthy of being inſerted at large, in the great General Dictionary. As it is not only our own opinion, but that of ſeveral literary friends, that it ſhould have been given entire by our predeceſſor, we ſhall here ſupply the defect.

" Good Dr. Sheldon,

" I do here ſend you news, as unto my beſt friend, of a great and happy victory, which at length with extream difficultie I have ſcarcely obtained over the onely enemie that can hurt me, that is, my ſelfe.

" Sir, ſo it is, that though I am in debt to your ſelfe and others of my friends above twenty pounds more than I know how to pay; though I am in want of many conveniencies; though in great danger of falling into a chronicall infirmitie of my body; though in another thing, which you perhaps gueſſe at what it is, but I will not tell you, which would make me more joyfull of preferment then all theſe (if I could come honeſtly by it;) though money comes to me from my father's purſe like blood from his veins, or from his heart; though I am very ſenſible that I have been too long already an unprofitable burden to my Lord, and muſt not ſtill continue ſo; though my refuſing preferment, may perhaps (which fear, I aſſure you, does much afflict me) be injurious to my friends and intimate acquaintance, and prejudicial to them in the way of theirs; though conſcience of my own good intention and deſire, ſuggeſts unto me many flattering hopes of great poſſibilitie of doing God and his Church ſervice, if I had that preferment which I may fairly hope for; though I may juſtly fear, that by refuſing thoſe preferments which I ſought for, I ſhall gain the reputation of weakneſſe and levity, and incur their diſpleaſure, whoſe good opinion of me, next to God's favour, and my own good opinion of my ſelfe, I do eſteem and deſire above all things; though all theſe and many other terribiles viſu formæ have repreſented themſelves to my imagination in the moſt hideous manner that may be; yet I am at length firmly and unmoveably reſolved, if I can have no preferment without Subſcription, that I neither can, nor will have any.

" For this reſolution I have but one reaſon againſt a thouſand temptations to the contrary, but it is ἓν μέγα, againſt which if all the little reaſons in the world were put in the ballance, they would be lighter than vanity. In brief, this it is: as long as I keep that modeſt and humble aſſurance of God's love and favour which I now enjoy, and wherein I hope I ſhall be daily more and more confirmed; ſo long, in deſpite of all the world, I may and ſhall and will be happy. But if I once loſe this; though all the world ſhould conſpire to make me happy, I ſhall and muſt be extremely miſerable. Now this ineſtimable jewel, if I ſubſcribe (without ſuch a Declaration as will make the Subſcription no Subſcription,) I ſhall wittingly and willingly and deliberately throw away. For though I am very well perſwaded of you and my other friends, who do ſo with a full perſwaſion that you may do it lawfully; yet the caſe ſtands ſo with me, and I can ſee no remedy but for ever it will do ſo, that if I ſubſcribe, I ſubſcribe my own Damnation. For though I do verily believe the Church of England a true member of the Church; that ſhe wants nothing neceſſary to ſalvation, and holds nothing repugnant to it; and had thought that to think ſo, had ſufficiently qualified me for a Subſcription: yet now I plainly ſee, if I will not juggle with my Conſcience, and play with God Almighty, I muſt forbear.

" For, to ſay nothing of other things, which I have ſo well conſidered as not to be in ſtate to ſign them, and yet not ſo well as to declare my ſelf againſt them; two points there are, wherein I am fully reſolved, and therefore care not who knows my mind. One is, that to ſay the fourth Commandment is a Law of God appertaining to Chriſtians, is falſe and unlawfull: the other, that the damning ſentences in St. Athanaſius's Creed (as we are made to ſubſcribe it) are moſt falſe, and alſo in a high degree preſumptuous and ſchiſmaticall. And therefore I can neither ſubſcribe that theſe things are agreeable to the word of God, ſeeing I believe they are certainly repugnant to it: nor that the whole Common-Prayer is lawful to be uſed, ſeeing I believe theſe parts of it certainly unlawfull; nor promiſe that I my ſelf will uſe it, ſeeing I never intend either to read theſe things which I have now excepted againſt, or to ſay Amen to them.

" I ſhall not need to intreat you, not to be offended with mee for this my moſt honeſt, and (as I verily believe) moſt wiſe Reſolution: hoping rather, you will do your endeavour, that I may neither be honeſt at ſo dear a rate, as the loſſe of preferment, nor buy preferment at ſo much dearer a rate, the loſſe of honeſty."

" I think my ſelfe happy that it pleaſed God, when I was reſolved to venture upon a ſubſcription without full aſſurance of the lawfulneſſe of it, to caſt in my way two unexpected impediments to divert me from accompliſhing my reſolution. For I profeſs unto you, ſince I entertained it, I have never enjoyed quiet day nor night, till now that I have rid my ſelf of it again; and I plainly perceive, that if I had ſwallowed this pill howſoever guilded over with gloſſes and reſervations, and wrapt up in conſerves of good intentions and purpoſes, yet it would never have agreed nor ſtay'd with me, but I would have caſt it up again, and with it whatſoever preferment I ſhould have gained with it as the wages of unrighteouſneſs; which would have been a great injury to you, and to my Lord Keeper: whereas now, res eſt integra; and he will not looſe the gift of any preferment by beſtowing it on mee, nor have any engagement to Mr. Andrewes for me.

" But however this would have ſucceeded in caſe I had then ſubſcribed, I thank God, I am now ſo reſolved, that I will never do, that while I am living and in health, which I would not do if I were dying; and this I am ſure I would not do. I would never do any thing for preferment, which I would not do but for preferment: and this, I am ſure, I ſhould not do. I will never undervalue the happineſs which Gods love brings to mee with it, as to put it to the leaſt adventure in the world, for the gaining of any worldly happineſſe. I remember very well, quærite primum regnum Dei, & cætera omnia adjicientur tibi: and therefore whenever I make ſuch a prepoſterous choice, I will give you leave to think I am out of my wits, or do not beleeve in God, or at leaſt am ſo unreaſonable as to do a thing in hope I ſhall be ſorry for it afterwards, and wiſh it undone.

" It cannot be avoided, but my Lord of Canterbury muſt come to know this my reſolution, and, I think, the ſooner the better. Let me entreat you to acquaint him with it, (if you think it expedient,) and let me hear from you as ſoon as poſſibly you can. But when you write, I pray remember, that my foregoing preferment (in this ſtate wherein I am) is grief enough to me; and do not you add to it, by being angry with mee for doing that, which I muſt do or be miſerable. I am your moſt loving and true Servant, &c (88)."

(88) Des Maizeaux's Hiſt. and Crit. Account of the Life and Writings of W. Chillingworth, p. 86—98.

It is ſomewhat remarkable, that Mr. Chillingworth, after having expreſſed himſelf in a manner ſo uncommonly ſtrong upon the ſubject, ſhould, in no long ſpace of time, ſubſcribe to the Articles of the Church. His ſubſcription to them as articles of peace and union, hath been animadverted upon by a worthy and ſenſible writer, the Rev. Dr. Robertſon, of Wolverhampton (89). However, whether Chillingworth's opinion upon this head was right or wrong, there can be no doubt, from the whole tenor of his life, but that he acted with perfect integrity.

(89) See the paſſage in the British Biography, vol. v. p. 149, 150.

There is, likewiſe, another letter of his, written to one of his friends, who had deſired to know what judgment might be made of Arianiſm from the ſenſe of antiquity, which is very celebrated, and which, therefore, ought not to have paſſed unnoticed by our learned predeceſſor. It ſtrongly marks the liberal and inquiſitive turn of mind of which Mr. Chillingworth was poſſeſſed; and certainly as well deſerves a place here as it did in the great General Dictionary.

" Deare Harry,

" I am very ſorry it was my ill fortune not to ſee thee the day that I went out of Oxford: otherwiſe I ſhould haue thanked thee very heartily for the fauour thou didſt the night before, eſpecially for Mr. Couentryes company and diſcourſe, whoſe excellent witt witt I doe very much admire, and had I ſo much intereſt in h'm as you haue, I ſhould deſire him often (though I hope I need not) to remember what our Sauiour ſayes,——To whom much is giuen, of them much ſhall be required.

" Mr. Taylor did much confirme my opinion of his ſufficience; but let mee tell you in your eare—— meethinkes he wants much of the Ethicall part of a diſcourſer, and ſlights too much many times the arguments of thoſe he diſcourſes with: but this is a fault he would quickly leaue, if he had a friend that would diſcreetly tell him of it. If you or Mr. Couentry would tell him, that you heard one that knowes him, magnifye him exceedingly for other thinges, but cenſure him for this, you might doe him a very friendly office: and my writing to you thus much, giues you grownd enough to ſay ſo truely: but you muſt not giue the leaſt ſuſpicion that I am the man, and therefore not doe it yet a good while.

" When Dr. Sheldon comes to Oxford, I will be there againe, and then will be very ready to doe any ſeruice in the buſineſſe you imparted to mee.

" I was miſtaken in my directing you to Euſebius for the matter you wott of. You ſhall find it in a witneſſe much farther from exception herein, then Euſebius: euen Athanaſius himſelfe, the greateſt aduerſary of that doctrine; and Hilary who was his ſecond. See the firſt, in Ep. de Synodis Arim. & Seleuc. p. 917. D. Tom. 1. edit. Pariſ. 1627. See the ſecond, de Synodis, fol. 97. In the firſt, you ſhall find that the eighty Fathers which condemned Samoſatenus, affirmed expreſſely,——That the Sonne is not of the ſame eſſence of the Father: which is to contradict formally the Councell of Nice, which decreed the Sonne Coeſſentiall to the Father. In the ſecond, you ſhall find theſe wordes to the ſame purpoſe,——Octoginta Epiſcopi olim reſpuerunt τὸ Homouſion. See alſo, if you pleaſe, Juſtin. cent. Tryph. p. 283. 356, 357. Tertull. againſt Praxeas, c. 9. Novatian de Trin. in fine, who is joyned with Tertullian. Athanaſ. Ep. de Fide Dion. Alex. T. 1. p. 551. Baſil. T. 2. p. 802, 803. *edit. See Petavius upon Epiph. his Panar. ad Hær. 69. quæ eſt Arij. p. 285. and conſider how well he cleares Lucian the Martyr from Arianiſme, and what he there confeſſes of all the Ancient Fathers.

" If you could underſtand French, I would referre to Perron, p. 633. of his Reply to K. James; where you ſhould find theſe wordes: If a man ſhould demand of an Arrian, if he would ſubmitt to the judgment of the Church of the ages præcedent to that of Conſtantine and Marcian, he would make no difficulty of it, but would preſſe himſelfe that the Controverſye might be decided by that little which remaines to us of the Authors of that time. For an Arrian would find in Irenæus, Tertullian, and others, which remaine of thoſe ages,——That the Sonne is the inſtrument of the Father; That the Father commanded the Sonne in the works of creation; That the Father and the Sonne are——aliud & aliud: which thinges he that ſhould now hold, now when the Language of the Church is more examined, would be eſteemed a very Arrian.

" If you reade Bellarmine touching this matter, you ſhould find that he is troubled exceedingly to find any tolerable gloſſes for the ſpeeches of the Fathers before the Councell of Nice which are againſt him; and yet he conceals the ſtrongeſt of them: and to counterpoyſe them, cites Authors that haue indeed ancient Names, but ſuch whom he himſelfe has ſtigmatized for ſpurious or doubtfull in his booke de Script. Eccleſ.

" Were I at leyſure, and had a little longer time, I could referre you to ſome that acknowledge Origens judgment to be alſo againſt them in this matter. And Fiſhar in his Anſweare to Dr. Whites Nine Quæſtions, has a place almoſt parallel to that aboue cited out of Perron.

" In a word, whoſoeuer ſhall freely and impartially conſider of this thing, and how on the other ſide the Ancient Fathers weapons againſt the Arrians, are in a manner onely places of Scripture, (and thoſe now for the moſt part diſcarded as impertinent and unconcluding,) and how in the argument drawne from the authority of the Ancient Fathers, they are almoſt alwayes defendants, and ſcarſe euer opponents; he ſhall not chooſe but confeſſe, or at leaſt be very inclinable to beleeue, that the Doctrine of Arrius is eyther a Truth, or at leaſt no damnable Hæreſy.

" But the Carryer ſtayes for my Le.ter, and I haue now no more time than to adde that I am, Thy very true and louing Friend, &c. (90).

The two letters inſerted above were ſubjoined to the eighth edition of Mr. Chillingworth's works, but were omitted in the ninth edition, publiſhed in 1727. This omiſſion excited ſome ſevere, but juſt, ſtrictures, from a very learned Divine of the Church of England (91). The letters have again found their proper place, in Dr. Birch's edition of 1742.

An account of Dr. Cheynel's behaviour at Mr. Chillingworth's funeral, was publiſhed, ſome years ſince, in a periodical work, entitled the Student; but we do not recollect that it contains any new information. Cheynel's conduct was replete with bigotry. He was one of thoſe violent Preſbyterians and Calviniſts of the laſt age, who knew but little of the true principles of toleration and candour. Yet it is univerſally acknowledged, that he treated Mr. Chillingworth with the greateſt perſonal compaſſion. The feelings of his heart roſe above the narrowneſs of his mind. Dr. Calamy relates, upon the evidence of an old Miniſter, who had been well acquainted with Cheynel, that he was diſordered in his brain ſome years before his death (*). " When ever " that is the caſe, ſays the Nonconformiſt Hiſtorian, " it is not at all to be wondered at, if a man's ac- " tions are unaccountable (92)." Could it be proved that Dr. Cheynel's inſanity had, in any reſpect, taken place at the time of Mr. Chillingworth's deceaſe, the remark would be juſt.

From the catalogue of Mr. Chillingworth's pieces in manuſcript, and from a paſſage in one of his ſermons, it appears, that he conſidered it as criminal to reſiſt a lawful Prince, though he might be in the higheſt degree impious and tyrannical. Strange as this opinion may now be thought, and juſtly as it is exploded, it was maintained in the laſt century by ſeveral wiſe and good men, who were otherwiſe of a rational and liberal turn of ſentiment.

It were to be wiſhed, that Mr. Chillingworth's " Problematical Tentamen againſt puniſhing Crimes with Death in Chriſtian Societies" had been preſerved and printed. The reflections of ſo thinking a man on ſuch a ſubject, and which hath not to this day been treated of with ſufficient extent, accuracy and preciſion, would probably have been found well worthy of attention.

In the Sidney Papers, there is a letter which imports, that Mr. Chillingworth defended Socinianiſm, and was therein utterly and immediately confuted by Lord Falkland (93). It is highly probable, that the writer of the letter did not underſtand the difference between Arianiſm and Socinianiſm; for with regard to the latter charge, he hath deciſively cleared himſelf of it, in the preface to his " Religion of Proteſtants the true Way to Salvation."

Many additional teſtimonies might be produced, were it neceſſary, to the excellency of this great work. We remember well, that Biſhop Warburton calls it an immortal book; and immortal indeed it will be, unleſs good ſenſe and ſound reaſoning ſhould be totally baniſhed from the world. It ought to be read by every man who wiſhes thoroughly to comprehend the true grounds of the Proteſtant reformation, and to ſee Popery fundamentally and effectually confuted. That ſection in which Mr. Chillingworth cries out, " The BIBLE, I ſay, the BIBLE only is the religion of Proteſtants," hath been quoted and referred to times without number. It is to the diſcredit of Dr. Hare, that he hath thrown ſome degree of contempt on this paſſage, and united with thoſe enemies of Chillingworth who have repreſented him as much abler in pulling down than in building up (94). On the contrary, upon the ruins of Popery he hath erected an edifice of Proteſtantiſm which will laſt for ever.

Mr. Chillingworth is the laſt of that groupe of intimate friends, whoſe characters have been ſo finely drawn by Lord Clarendon. With the noble Hiſtorian's repreſentation of him, we ſhall conclude this note, omitting two paſſages in which there are miſtakes in point of fact.

" Mr. Chillingworth was of a ſtature little ſuperior to Mr. Hales, (and it was an age in which there were many great and wonderful men of that ſize) and a man of ſo great a ſubtilty of underſtanding, and ſo rare a temper in debate; that as it was impoſſible to provoke him into any paſſion, ſo it was very difficult to keep a man's ſelf from being a little diſcompoſed by his ſharpneſs, and quickneſs of argument, and inſtances, in which he had a rare facility, and a great advantage over all the men I ever knew. He had ſpent all his younger time in diſputation; and had arrived to ſo great a maſtery, as he was inferiour to no man in thoſe ſkirmiſhes; but he had, with his notable perfection in this exerciſe, contracted ſuch an irreſolution, and habit of doubting, that by degrees he grew confident of nothing, and a ſceptick at leaſt, in the greateſt myſteries of faith.

" This made him from firſt wavering in Religion, and indulging to ſcruples, to reconcile himſelf too ſoon, and too eaſily to the Church of Rome; and carrying ſtill his own inquiſitiveneſs about him, without any reſignation to their authority (which is the only temper can make that Church ſure of its Proſelytes) having made a journey to *St. Omers, purely to perfect his converſion, by the converſation of thoſe who had the greateſt name, he found as little ſatisfaction there, and returned with as much haſte from them; with a belief that an entire exemption from error was neither inherent in, nor neceſſary to any Church: which occaſioned that war, which was carried on by the Jeſuits with ſo great aſperity, and reproaches againſt him, and in which he defended himſelf, by ſuch an admirable eloquence of language, and clear and incomparable power of reaſon, that he not only made them appear unequal adverſaries, but carried the war into their own quarters; and made the Pope's infallibility to be as much ſhaken, and declined by their own doctors (and as great an acrimony amongſt themſelves upon that ſubject) and to be at leaſt as much doubted, as in the ſchools of the reformed or Proteſtant; and forced them ſince, to defend and maintain thoſe unhappy controverſies in religion, with arms and weapons of another nature, than were uſed, or known in the Church of Rome, when Bellarmine died; and which probably will in time undermine the very foundation that ſupports it.

" Such a levity, and propenſity to change is commonly attended with great infirmities in, and no leſs reproach and prejudice to the perſon; but the ſincerity of his heart was ſo conſpicuous and without the leaſt temptation of any corrupt end, and the innocence and candour in his nature ſo evident and without any perverſeneſs; that all who knew him, clearly diſcerned, that all thoſe reſtleſs motions and fluctuations proceeded only from the warmth and jealouſy of his own thoughts, in a too nice inquiſition for truth. Neither the books of the adverſary, nor any of their perſons, though he was acquainted with the beſt of both, had ever made great impreſſion upon him; all his doubts grew out of himſelf, when he aſſiſted his ſcruples with all the ſtrength of his own reaſon, and was then too hard for himſelf; but finding as little quiet and repoſe in thoſe victories, he quickly recovered, by a new appeal to his own judgment; ſo that he was in truth, upon the matter, in all his ſallies, and retreats, his own convert; though he was not ſo totally diveſted of all thoughts of this world, but that when he was ready for it, he admitted ſome great and conſiderable churchmen, to be ſharers with him in his public converſion.

" He did readily believe all war to be unlawful; and did not think that the parliament (whoſe proceedings he perfectly abhorred) did in truth intend to involve the Nation in a Civil War, till after the battle of Edgehill; and then he thought any expedient, or ſtratagem that was like to put a ſpeedy end to it, to be the moſt commendable.

" He was a man of excellent parts, and of a cheerful diſpoſition; void of all kind of vice, and endued with many notable virtues; of a very publick heart, and an indefatigable deſire to do good; his only unhappineſs proceeded from his ſleeping too little, and thinking too much; which ſometimes threw him into violent fevers (95)."] K.

 [CHISHULL (EDMUND), a learned Divine and Antiquary, was born at Eyworth, in Bedfordſhire, and was the ſon of Paul Chiſhull, who is ſaid, by Anthony Wood, to have been formerly Bible Clerk of Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took his Bachelor's degree; and who afterwards, on the 18th of June, 1634, was admitted Maſter of Arts, as a Member of Pembroke College, Oxford (a). Where Edmund Chiſhull received his grammatical education we are not informed; but being intended for the church, he was removed, at a proper age, to Oxford, and became a ſcholar of Corpus Chriſti College in that Univerſity. Here he received the degree of Maſter of Arts, on the 27th of February, 1693 (b); and he was choſen, likewiſe, a Fellow of his College. Previouſly to his commencing Maſter of Arts, he had made his firſt appearance in the world as an author, by publiſhing, in 1692, a Latin poem, in quarto, on occaſion of the famous battle of La Hogue. It was entitled, " Gulielmo " Tertio Terræ Marique Principi invictiſſimo in Gallos Pugna navali nuperrime devictos, Carmen heroicum." Oxon (c). When Queen Mary died, on the 28th of December, 1694, Mr. Chiſhull was one of the Oxford gentlemen who exerted their poetical talents in deploring that melancholy event. His tribute of loyalty and regard to her Majeſty's memory, the title of which is, " In Obitum Auguſtiſſimæ & Deſideratiſſimæ Reginæ MARIÆ, Paſtorale Carmen," hath been thought worthy of being preſerved in the third volume of the Muſæ Anglicanæ (d). As to the production itſelf, it is evidently more the reſult of claſſical taſte and imitation, than of a native genius for poetry; nor doth it derive any peculiar advantage from being written in the form of a paſtoral. In 1698, Mr. Chiſhull, having obtained a grant of the Traveller's place, from the Society of Corpus Chriſti College, ſailed from England on the 12th of September, and arrived on the 19th of November following at Smyrna. Before he ſet out on his voyage, he preached a ſermon to the Levant Company, which was publiſhed (e), and the text of which was taken from Pſalm cvii. 23, 24. " They that go down " to the ſea in ſhips, that do buſineſs in great waters; theſe ſee the works of the LORD, " and his wonders in the deep." This diſcourſe was probably delivered by Mr. Chiſhull, with a view of recommending himſelf to the Company; and it appears to have had its effect, for he was appointed Chaplain to the Engliſh factory at Smyrna, in which ſtation he continued till the 12th of February, 1701-2 (f). On the 16th of June, 1705, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (g). In the next year he engaged in a controverſy, which, at that time, excited conſiderable attention, by by publiſhing "A Charge of Hereſy maintained againſt Mr. Dodwell's late Epiſtolary "Diſcourſe concerning the Mortality of the Soul, by Way of Addreſs to the Clergy "of the Church of England; laying open his Oppoſition to the received Creeds, and "his Falſification of all ſacred and profane Antiquity." London, 8vo (b). This is reckoned one of the principal books that were written in anſwer to Mr. Dodwell's famous epiſtolary diſcourſe. In 1707, Mr. Chiſhull exerted his endeavours in oppoſing the abſurdities and enthuſiaſm of the French prophets, and their followers. For this purpoſe he preached a ſermon, on the 23d of November, at Serjeant's-Inn Chapel, in Chancery Lane, which was publiſhed (i) in the beginning of 1708, and was entitled, "The great Danger and Miſtake of all new uninſpired Prophecies relating to the End "of the World." An Appendix was added, of Hiſtorical Collections applicable to all ſuch Prophecies as were condemned in the Diſcourſe, and to thoſe which were then venting abroad. On the 1ſt of September, in the ſame year, Mr. Chiſhull was preſented, on the deceaſe of Mr. James Barker, to the Vicarage of Walthamſtow, in Eſſex; and in 1711, he had the honour of being appointed one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to the Queen. About the ſame time (k), he preached a viſitation ſermon, in the chapel of Rumford, before the Rev. Dr. Alſton, Archdeacon of Eſſex, and printed it under the title of "The Orthodoxy of an Engliſh Clergyman conſidered, as to four "Heads, viz. the received Creeds; the thirty-nine Articles; the Supremacy of the "Crown; the eſtabliſhed Liturgy of the Church." 4to. In 1712, he gave three ſeparate diſcourſes to the public. The two former ones were delivered at the aſſizes at Hertford, on the 3d of March, and the 11th of Auguſt. The firſt was on modeſty and moderation, or the true relative duty of the tolerated or eſtabliſhed parties in any ſociety of men; and the ſecond on the duty of good ſubjects, in relation to public peace. The third ſermon, which was againſt duelling, was preached before the Queen, at the Royal Chapel at Windſor Caſtle, on the 23d of November, and was publiſhed by her Majeſty's ſpecial command (l). In 1714, Mr. Chiſhull was again called upon to exert his abilities, in the pulpit and from the preſs, by recommending that valuable object, the Corporation for the Sons of the Clergy (m). His next printed diſcourſe was, "The Subject reminded of his Duty, from Tit. iii. 1. 1716," 8vo. Two farther aſſize ſermons (n) were publiſhed by him in the year 1718 (o).

Having mentioned Mr. Chiſhull's writings as a Divine, we proceed to thoſe with which he favoured the learned world as an Antiquary. One of his firſt publications in antiquities was in 1721, and was entitled, "Inſcriptio Sigæa antiquiſſima ΒΟΥΣΤΡΟ-"ΦΗΔΟΝ exarata. Commentario eam Hiſtorico-Grammatico-Critico illuſtravit Ed-"mundus Chiſhull, S. T. B. Regiæ Majeſtati à Sacris." Folio. This was followed by "Notarum ad Inſcriptionem Sigæam Appendicula; additâ à Sigæo alterâ Antiochi So-"teris Inſcriptione," folio, in fifteen pages, without a date. Both theſe pieces were afterwards incorporated in his Antiquitates Aſiaticæ. When Dr. Mead, in 1724, publiſhed his Harveian oration, which had been delivered, in the preceding year, at the Royal College of Phyſicians, Mr. Chiſull added to it, by way of Appendix, "Diſſer-"tatio de Nummis quibuſdam à Smyrnæis in Medicorum Honorem percuſſis." This diſſertation became, for a time, not a little celebrated, on account of its having given riſe to a controverſy very intereſting to the profeſſors of the medical art, and amuſing to the learned world in general. The queſtion was, whether the Phyſicians of ancient Rome were not uſually vile and deſpicable ſlaves, or whether there were not ſome, at leaſt, among them, who enjoyed the privileges of a free condition, and the reſpect due to their ſervices (p). The hiſtory of this controverſy will be found in the articles of Mead and Middleton; and, therefore, we ſhall take no farther notice of it at preſent, than to obſerve, that Mr. Chiſhull has not been deemed happy in all his explanations of the Smyrnæan inſcriptions, and to inſert below a letter written by him, containing ſome proofs of the honour paid to phyſicians by the Grecians [A]. In 1728, appeared, in [A] A letter written by him, containing ſome proofs of the honour paid to Phyſicians by the Grecians.] This letter was copied, by Mr. Bowyer, from a rough draught in Mr. Chiſhull's own hand. It was addreſſed to Dr. Mead, and is as follows:

"Honoured Sir,

"It is with the greateſt pleaſure that I find myſelf honoured with any command of your's; and I ſhall be truly glad if any thing noted under the following heads may fall in with your deſign.

"I. The chief honours and rewards given to ſome eminent Greek Phyſicians are at once noted by Pliny, l. vii. c. 37.

"II. Thoſe beſtowed on Hippocrates may more particularly be noted in the Δόγμα Αθηναίων among his Epiſtles, and his life from Serranus; and the hiſtory as to that matter is the ſame whether thoſe pieces be genuine or not.

"III. Beſides theſe, Eraſiſtratus was in great honour in the court of Seleucus and Antiochus Soter, upon his diſcovering the diſtemper of the latter: which ſee in Plutarch, Life of Demetrius, and Appian in Syriacis. The reward of a hundred talents mentioned by Pliny, l. xxvi. c. 1. was for curing the ſame Antiochus of another dangerous illneſs. The ſcarcity of inſtances of this ſort has been owing to this, that Phyſic was not anciently profeſſed as now-a-days in the nature of a liberal ſcience, but was always joined with Pharmacy and Chirurgery, and ſo practiſed in great meaſure by illiterate perſons.

"IV. From hence a ready anſwer may be given to thoſe ſevere ſatires of Cato and Pliny againſt Medici and Medicina, l. xxvi. c. 1. as alſo from the virtuous and in folio, his great work, " Antiquitates Aſiaticæ Chriſtianam Æram antecedentes; ex " Primariis Monumentis Græcis deſcriptæ, Latinè verſæ, Notiſque & Commentariis " illuſtratæ. Accedit Monumentum Latinum Ancyranum." Dr. Mead contributed fifty-one guineas, Dr. William Sherard twenty, and Dr. Liſle five guineas, towards the printing of this book. It was publiſhed by ſubſcription, at one guinea for a common copy, and two guineas for thoſe which were upon royal paper. The work contains a collection of inſcriptions made by Conſul Sherard, Dr. Picenini, and Dr. Liſle, afterwards Biſhop of St. Aſaph. This collection was depoſited in the Earl of Oxford's library, and is now preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum. Mr. Chiſhull added to the Antiquitates Aſiaticæ two ſmall pieces which he had before publiſhed, viz. " Conjectanea " de Nummo CKΩIII inſcripto," and " Iter Aſiæ Poeticum," addreſſed to the Rev. John Horn. Our author not having ſucceeded in his explication of an inſcription to Jupiter Ourios, afterwards cancelled it, and ſubſtituted (q) a different interpretation by Dr. Aſhton, which compleatly ſettled the matter. Mr. Chiſhull did not ſubmit, in this caſe, with ſo good a grace as might have been wiſhed, and ought to have been expected. He added alſo, at the ſame time, another half ſheet, with a head of Homer, of which only fifty copies were printed. He had formed the deſign of publiſhing a ſecond volume, under the title of " Antiquitates Aſiaticæ; Pars altera diverſa, diverſarum Urbium in- " ſcripta Marmora complectens." The printing of this work was begun; but the author's death put a ſtop to the progreſs of it, and it does not appear what became of his manuſcripts (r). In 1731, Mr. Chiſhull was preſented to the Rectory of South-Church in Eſſex. This preferment he did not long live to enjoy; for he departed the preſent life, at Walthamſtow, on the 18th of May, 1733. Mr. Clarke, of Chicheſter, writing to Mr. Bowyer, ſays, " I was very ſorry for Mr. Chiſhull's death as a public " loſs." That our author ſuſtained an excellent character, as a Clergyman and a Divine, cannot be doubted. Two letters, written by him to his friend Mr. Bowyer, and which Mr. Nichols hath preſerved, are evident proofs both of the piety and ſympathy of his diſpoſition (s). With reſpect to his literary abilities, Dr. Taylor ſtiles him " Vir celeberrimus Ingenii Acumine & Literarum Peritia, quibus excellebat maxime;"

and pious principles of the oath of Hippocrates, particularly the obligation to teach ἄνευ μισθοῦ, and ἁγνῶς καὶ ὁσίως διατηρῆσαι βίον, κ. τ. λ.

" V. The ſame calumny may be anſwered from the contrary character of Pliny, l. xxv. c. 2.—— Pythagoras and Ariſtotle were both much addicted to this noble ſtudy. The former was the firſt that wrote of the virtue of herbs, Plin. xxv. 2. He kept it a ſecret, as he did his other attainments. But the latter, ſays Ælian, l. v. c. 9. Athen. l. viii. c. 13. φαρμακοπώλης ἀνεφάνη, was a profeſſed apothecary. If he condeſcended to a ſhop according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, he yet ſhewed himſelf above it by his work, entitled Ἰατρικὰ, beſides what he wrote concerning Plants and Anatomy.

" VI. It was this character that firſt endeared Ariſtotle ſo much to Alexander the Great, whom, upon his firſt coming to him, he cured of a great illneſs; and becauſe he enjoined him to uſe much ambulation for the confirming of his cure, this by ſome has been taken to be the reaſon of Ariſtotle's being ſurnamed the Peripatetic. Laertius.

" VII. Alexander himſelf learned of Ariſtotle to ſtudy and even to practiſe Phyſic (Plut. in vit. Alex. c. 13. p. m. 668.) δοκεῖ δέ μοι καὶ τὸ φιλιατρεῖν Ἀλεξάνδρῳ προσγένεσθαι μᾶλλον ἑτέρων Ἀριστοτέλης· ὲ γὰρ μόνον τὴν θεωρίαν ἠγάπησεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ νοσοῦσιν ἐβοήθει τοῖς φίλοις, καὶ συνέτατλε θεραπείας τινὰς καὶ διαίτας.

" VIII. The hiſtorian has well expreſſed it μᾶλλον ἑτέρων: for it was uſual with Alexander to beſtow the greateſt marks of eſteem and honour on other Phyſicians: Witneſs the ſtory of his cure by Philip of Acarnania, and the ſignal honour paid to that Phyſician, as by the King himſelf, ſo by his whole army. Alexander ſhewed him, ſays Arrian, (l. ii. c. 4.) ὅτι πιστός ἐστιν αὐτῳ φίλος· and the whole army, ſays Curtius, l. iii. c. 6. grates habebant tanquam præſenti Deo.

" IX. Herophilus and Eraſiſtratus, l. xxix. c. 1. where thoſe who firſt made learning neceſſary to Phyſic; which being a thing of great expence and pains, Pliny tells us, the ſchool of Herophilus did not long ſubſiſt. Deſerta deinde & hæc ſecta, quoniam neceſſe erat in ea ſcire literas. Of his ſchool, ſee Plin. l. xxvi. c. 2.

" X. But we learn from Strabo, at the end of Book xii. that the ſchool both of the one and the other flouriſhed till about his time in Aſia, the one near Laodicea, and the other at Smyrna. He there names as maſters of theſe, Zeuxes, Alexander, and Hiceſius. And Athenæus often mentions the ſame Ἰκέσιος as an author, and l. ii. c. 18. Μιθόδωρος Ἐρασιστρατείας Ἰκεσίου φίλος. Pliny, Hiceſio non parvæ authoritatis medico. The faces and characters of all theſe we have ſtill preſerved in coins at Smyrna, with many others brought by Mr. Sherard, and now repoſited in the Duke of Devonſhire's cabinet; which city allowed that particular honour to thoſe profeſſors. They are found with their faces ſtampt on one ſide, and their profeſſion noted on the other, by figures in a fitting poſture, with the finger advanced to their lips in token of that ſilence which the profeſſion was enjoined by the oath of Hippocrates. And before the face of ſome is an Aſteriſk, of others a Thunderbolt; the meaning of which marks is told us by Laertius in the life of Plato, viz. κεραύνιον implying τὴν ἀγωγὴν τῆς φιλοσοφίας, and ἀστέρισκος τὴν συμφωνίαν τῶν δογμάτων.

" This Phyſic School at Smyrna was adjoining moſt probably to the temple of Æſculapius, the ruins of which are ſtill extant near a large fountain of extreme cold water, called Arco-baſcar, ſituate, as is mentioned by Pauſanias, near the ſea, (Pauſan. l. ii. c. 26.) In this place was dug up about thirty years ago, and ſold by Sir Philip Jackſon then reſident at Smyrna to Monſ. Galland, and by him repoſited in the gallery of Verſailles, a fine buſt inſcribed,

" ΜΑΡΚΟΣ ΜΟΔΙΟΣ ΙΑΤΡΟΣ ΜΕΘΟΔΙΚΟΣ.

The word Μεθόδικος intimating the ſect of Modius, as ἰήτης Μεθόδῳ does the like in another printed inſcription. What it was is explained by Celſus, l. i. c. 1. Harum obſervationem medicinam eſſe . . . . . quam μέθοδον Græci nominant, &c. Among the Δειπνοσοφισταὶ of Athenæus, in argumento operis, are regiſtered with great honour the characters of Daphnus of Epheſus, as well as the renowned Galen, ἱερὸς τὴν τέχνην, κ. λ.

" XII. Another inſcription found in the ſame place and engraven under a head, now loſt, is as follows:

" ΗΕΡΜΟΓΕΝΗΣ ΧΑΡΙΔΗΜΟΥ κ. τ. λ (1)."

(u) Mr. Chiſhull was the author of the Latin inſcription on the monument erected in the church of Stowe, Northamptonſhire, to the memory of Dr. Tho. Turner, Preſident of Corpus Chriſti College, Oxford, and the great benefactor to the charity for the relief of clergymen's widows and children.

 [CHUBB (THOMAS) *, a noted controverſial writer, was born at Eaſt-Harnham, a ſmall village near Saliſbury, on the 29th of September, in the year 1679. His father, who was a maltſter, died in 1688, leaving a widow, with four children, of whom Thomas was the youngeſt. As his mother laboured hard to procure a maintenance for herſelf and family, ſo ſhe obliged her children to contribute their parts towards it; and accordingly, Thomas was required very early to perform ſuch work and ſervice as ſuited his age and capacity. Being thus circumſtanced, the whole education he received was the being taught to read, to write an ordinary hand, and to underſtand the common rules of arithmetick. Furniſhed with this inſtruction, which was ſufficient for his views in life, he was put apprentice, in the year 1694, to Mr. Thomas Rawlings, a glover in Saliſbury; and when he had ſerved his apprenticeſhip, was under the neceſſity of working as a journeyman to his maſter, though the buſineſs was improper for him, on account of a weakneſs he had in his ſight. He continued in this ſituation till about the year 1705, when he removed to Mr. John Lawrence's, a tallow-chandler in the ſame city; after which he ſupported himſelf, partly by making gloves, and partly by aſſiſting Mr. Lawrence in his buſineſs (a). All theſe diſadvantages of ſtation and employment, could not prevent Mr. Chubb from riſing to conſiderable intellectual improvements. Being poſſeſſed of uncommon natural abilities, and having a very ſtudious turn of mind, he ſpent his leiſure hours in the acquiſition of ſuch knowledge as could be obtained from Engliſh authors; to whom his reading was neceſſarily confined through his whole life, as he never underſtood any other language than his mother-tongue. In this way, however, he acquired a competent ſkill in Mathematics, Geography, and other branches of Science; but his inclination led him chiefly to the ſtudy of divinity. Whilſt he was thus endeavouring to improve his underſtanding, he faithfully and contentedly diſcharged the duties of his humble ſituation, and appeared to have no deſire of emerging from the obſcurity in which he was born and educated, when an unexpected event drew upon him the notice of the world, and laid the foundation of his future eminence.

* For the materials of this article, we are principally indebted to Mr. Cooper, of Saliſbury, and to the Rev. Charles Toogood, of Sherborne, Dorſetſhire.

In the latter end of the year 1710, the upright and learned Mr. Whiſton publiſhed the "Hiſtorical Preface" to his "Primitive Chriſtianity revived;" which performance ſoon fell into the hands of Mr. Chubb, and ſome of his acquaintance who intereſted themſelves in reſearches of this kind. The principal point diſcuſſed in this preface being the ſupremacy of the one God and Father of all, ſeveral of Chubb's friends embraced Mr. Whiſton's ſentiments, whilſt others adhered to the contrary opinion, the reſult of which was a paper controverſy. As the diſputants ſeemed ſhy of expreſſing themſelves plainly and fully upon the queſtion, and choſe rather to oppoſe each other by interrogations, Mr. Chubb, who was perſuaded that their method of conducting the debate was altogether unlikely to bring it to an iſſue, drew up, for that reaſon, his thoughts on the ſubject in a way which appeared to him better adapted for clearing and deciding the point in conteſt. This he did merely for his own ſatisfaction, and for that of his friends at Saliſbury, without the leaſt view to publication. Having collected and arranged his ſentiments on the ſubject, his manuſcript was ſubmitted to the examination of his acquaintance and others; and this produced a farther controverſy between Mr. Chubb and ſeveral perſons who did not agree with him in opinion. Whilſt matters were thus ſituated, one of the author's friends, who intended to take a journey to London, requeſted that he might carry the treatiſe thither, and put it into the hands of Mr. Whiſton. Some of Mr. Chubb's other acquaintance concurring in the ſame requeſt, he was prevailed upon to comply with their deſire. The manuſcript was accordingly carried to Mr. Whiſton, who was ſo well pleaſed with it, as to ſignify, by a letter to the author, his approbation of the performance, and his wiſh that it might be publiſhed. Mr. Whiſton, at the ſame time, offered himſelf to undertake the care of the publication, provided Mr. Chubb would permit him to make a few alterations, in expreſſing the ſenſe of ſome texts of Scripture, which would not at all affect the grand point in queſtion. This propoſal being accepted, the manuſcript was publiſhed without delay; and thus Mr. Chubb made his firſt appearance in the world as a writer (b). His Treatiſe was entitled, "The Supremacy of the Father aſſerted: or eight Arguments from Scripture to prove, that the Son is a Being inferiour and ſubordinate to the Father, and that the Father is the ſupreme God." It was firſt printed in the year 1715, and was introduced with a dedication "To the Reverend the Clergy, and in Particular to the Right Reverend Gilbert Lord Biſhop of Sarum, our vigilant and laborious Dioceſan." In this dedication the author obſerves, that what he had attempted in his work, was "to vindicate and reſtore the firſt great article of primitive Chriſtian Faith, viz. that there is but one ſupreme God; and that the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and He only, excluſively of all other beings, ſubſiſtences, perſon, and perſons whatſo-

" ever, is the one ſupreme God."—" This and this only, ſays he, is what I have prin" cipally deſigned to make good; and therefore whatever elſe I may have happened to " touch upon, is only occaſionally, and as it has a relation to this important point (c)."
The perſpicuity and ability with which this tract was written, procured Mr. Chubb a great reputation. His extraordinary talents were acknowledged by thoſe who did not concur with him in opinion; and many perſons, of diſtinguiſhed knowledge and judgment, thought that the Scriptures were ſo clearly and explicitly in his favour, that he had proved what he undertook to maintain, beyond all poſſible contradiction. It was not, however, to be expected that an attack upon the commonly received doctrine of the Trinity would be paſſed over without animadverſion and cenſure. Our author's publication gave great offence to many angry ſpirits; and though he had treated the ſubject with the utmoſt decency, had manifeſted a ſincere reſpect for the ſacred writings, and had expreſſed himſelf in the temper and language of Chriſtianity, he was expoſed to a variety of rude, inſolent, and groundleſs aſperſions. He ſoon found himſelf, therefore, under a neceſſity of vindicating both his work and his character; which he did in a very powerful and convincing manner, in a Tract the title of which was, " The Supremacy
" of the Father vindicated: Or, obſervations on Mr. Claggett's book, entitled, Aria-
" niſm anatomized. Wherein is ſhewn, that what Mr. Claggett, and others, call Chriſt's
" divine Nature, is ſo far from being the real and very Son of God, that, on the contrary it is the very Father of God's Son (d)[A]. By this performance Mr. Chubb increaſed the reputation he had already gained. It was conſidered as a matter of great admiration, that productions diſtinguiſhed by ſo much ſtrength of reaſon, and perſpicuity of expreſſion, ſhould come from a perſon of low birth and mean education; and he was generally conſidered as an uncommon literary phænomenon. Being thus encouraged by the approbation of the public, he continued to employ his thoughts and his pen upon a variety of ſubjects, with ſuch diligence and ſucceſs, that, in the year 1730, he publiſhed a large collection of tracts [B], in a very handſome quarto volume. Theſe tracts added greatly to the ſurpriſe and pleaſure of the world (e). " By the way," ſays Mr. Pope, in a letter to Mr. Gay, written ſoon after their publication, " have you ſeen or converſed with Mr.
" Chubb, who is a wonderful phænomenon in Wiltſhire? I have read through his " whole volume with admiration of the writer, though not always with approbation
" of the doctrine (f)." It cannot be denied that Mr. Chubb, in this collection of [A] The ſupremacy of the Father vindicated, &c.] In this defence of his former treatiſe, our author ſhews, that though Mr. Claggett had undertaken to confute his arguments, he had been wholly unſucceſsful in the attempt. Mr. Chubb, at the ſame time, obſerves, that his adverſary had proſecuted his deſign in a very unbecoming and unchriſtian manner; the example of which he did not chooſe to imitate. " Though, ſays he, by baſe inſinuations, falſhood, and " ſlander, he (Claggett) hath given occaſion for the " raiſing of men's anger againſt me; yet I ſhall purſue " him with no other revenge, than barely to remind " him of his faults, and deſire God to give him " repentance, and a better mind (1)." The pamphlet is concluded with the following words. " Though " he has been pleaſed to ſit in judgment upon me, " and condemn me, yet I can ſee no juſt ground for " uneaſineſs upon this account; becauſe as he is not " commended, whom men commend, but whom the " Lord commendeth, ſo neither is he condemned, " whom men condemn, but whom the Lord con-demneth (2)."

" Reflections on national puniſhments" Theſe Tracts, being thirty-five in number, were publiſhed a ſecond time, in 1754, in two volumes, octavo. We ſhould ſuppoſe, from a peruſal of the Tracts themſelves, that a conſiderable number of them muſt have been ſeparately printed, before their appearance in 1730. But in what degree this was the caſe, we are not now able to determine; nor is the aſcertainment of it an object of any great importance.

Tracts,

Tracts, hath treated a variety of important points in a maſterly manner; and that, whilſt his reflections diſcover a mind inquiſitive after truth, and a heart devoted to the ſacred cauſe of civil and religious liberty, he writes with a temper and moderation truly chriſtian. His ſentiments, with regard to certain controverted queſtions in divinity, are, in many reſpects, conformable to thoſe of the moſt judicious expoſitors of the ſacred writings; and his obſervations on ſubjects of a different nature are, in general, ſuch as do honour to his diſcernment (g). But though his work, upon the whole, may well excite the admiration of every attentive and unprejudiced reader, the praiſes it is entitled to muſt be admitted with conſiderable abatement. From want of rightly underſtanding the phraſeology of ſcripture, and from other cauſes, he ſometimes deviates into error (h). He was deſtitute of that learning and critical ſkill which are neceſſary to the right explanation of a variety of paſſages in the ſacred writings; nor will his philoſophical and moral language and reaſoning be ſo much admired at preſent, as they were at the time in which he wrote. Dr. Clarke's metaphyſical and ethical Syſtem was then in the higheſt eſtimation. From that ſyſtem Mr. Chubb's modes of expreſſion are uſually borrowed, and upon that ſyſtem his arguments are generally built. But other hypotheſes are now prevalent, and other forms of ſpeaking are adopted; whether rightly or not, we do not here intend to enquire. However, if Mr. Chubb had ſtopped at this publication, or, at leaſt, ſooner than in fact he did, he would have left a great reputation behind him, and would juſtly have been eſteemed one of the wonders of the age. Thus much may be collected from the teſtimony of thoſe who afterwards viewed him in the moſt unfavourable light. Dr. Warburton, in a note on the paſſage concerning Mr. Chubb, in Mr. Pope's letter above cited, and in which letter Stephen Duck was alſo mentioned, expreſſes himſelf as follows. "This was "his (Chubb's) quarto volume, written before he had given any ſigns of thoſe extra-"vagances, which have ſince rendered him ſo famous. As the court ſet up Mr. Duck "for the rival of Mr. Pope, the city, at the ſame time, conſidered Chubb, as one "who would eclipſe Locke. The modeſty of the Court Poet kept him ſober in a "very intoxicating ſituation; while the vanity of this new-fangled Philoſopher aſſiſted "his ſage admirers in turning his head (i)"

Many of Mr. Chubb's pieces were evidently occaſioned either by ſuch queſtions as were then warmly debated among Divines, or by ſuch other works as came within the courſe of his reading. Agreeably to this diſpoſition of offering his thoughts to the public on diſputed points, and eſpecially on matters of theological controverſy, we find him, not long after the appearance of his quarto volume, committing to the preſs, "A Diſcourſe concerning Reaſon, with regard to Religion and divine Revelation: "Wherein is ſhewn, that Reaſon either is, or elſe that it ought to be, a ſufficient Guide "in Matters of Religion."—This tract was occaſioned by the Biſhop of London's ſecond paſtoral letter; and there were added to it, "Some Reflections upon the com-"parative Excellency and Uſefulneſs of moral and poſitive Duties;" a diſpute having ariſen on the ſubject, in conſequence of the publication of Dr. Clarke's Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm. In this treatiſe our author obſerves, that as, in the controverſy which occaſioned theſe reflections, moral and poſitive duties had been put in competition in reſpect of their excellency, and as it was a point in diſpute, to which of theſe the preference ought to be given, ſo he was induced to offer his ſentiments upon the queſtion, becauſe he thought it was a matter very intereſting to mankind. Having, accordingly, firſt ſhewn what he underſtood by moral, and what by poſitive duties, and what are the true grounds of our obligation in either caſe; and having alſo conſidered in what reſpects theſe may be compared, in order thereby to form a judgment to which of them the preference is due upon that compariſon; he concludes, that moral duties are highly preferable to poſitive duties, in all the ways in which they are capable of being compared; and that when they come in competition with regard to their excellency, then the difference is ſo great betwixt them, that they ſcarcely admit of a compariſon. Theſe ſentiments he ſhews to be agreeable to the authority and declarations of many of the writers of the Old and New Teſtament; and he juſtly inſiſts upon it, that the preſervation of the diſtinction, between the different obligation of moral and poſitives duties, is of no ſmall importance to mankind; becauſe our not forming right views concerning the ſubject, may occaſion our final miſcarriage (k) [C]. The poſi-tions (k) British Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 376, 377.

[C] May occaſion our final miſcarriage.] It may not be amiſs to inſert his own explanation of his ideas. "Poſitive Duties," ſays he, (by which he underſtands the performance of ſuch actions, as, in reaſon, we are not obliged to perform, when conſidered abſtractedly from, and antecedently to any promulged law that requires our performance of them) "are appointed as a means towards the attaining ſome wiſe and good end; and they are no farther valuable, than as they are ſubſervient to that end, viz. to lead us to the practice of moral duties, which, in truth, is the perfection of our nature. Now if we aſcribe to poſitive duties which are the means, that valuableneſs which only belongeth to the end, then we are in danger of relying upon the bare external compliance with a poſitive law, without regarding the end to which that law was directed, and ſo to deceive ourſelves to our undoing. This is that fatal rock upon which many religious profeſſions have ſplit: for when men conſider the externals of religion, (if I may ſo call them) as the tions advanced by our author, in the former part of this tract, having been objected to, he proceeded to an additional vindication of them, in a piece publiſhed in 1732, entitled, "The Sufficiency of Reaſon in Matters of Religion farther conſidered. Wherein "is ſhewn, that Reaſon, when carefully uſed and followed, is to every Man, who is "anſwerable to God for his Actions, under any or all the moſt diſadvantageous Circumſtances he can poſſibly fall into, whether he reſides in China, or at the Cape of Good Hope, a ſufficient Guide in Matters of Religion; that is, it is ſufficient to guide "him to God's Favour, and the Happineſs of another World [D]." This publication the principal and moſt valuable parts of it, then they are too apt to rely upon theſe, as what will render them moſt acceptable to God, and ſo to neglect to have that rectitude of mind and life, which will only render them pleaſing in the eyes of their Maker.

"This was the caſe of the Jews of old; for as the particular circumſtances and temper of that people required, that a greater number and variety of poſitive duties ſhould be practiſed by them, than otherwiſe there would have been occaſion for; ſo they raiſed the worth of theſe greatly above their true value; and then they thought that the bare external compliance with thoſe poſitive laws, would ſufficiently ſecure to them God's favour. Whereas, if thoſe Jews had preſerved a juſt ſenſe of the worth and value of poſitive duties, and had conſidered them only as means to an end, and that they were no farther valuable than as they become ſubſervient to that end, then they could not have thus erred, and deceived themſelves in a point of ſuch importance, as it is manifeſt they did. And,

"This has been too much the caſe amongſt Chriſtians. They have raiſed the value of poſitive duties above what is meet, which has laid a foundation for a multitude of thoſe ſuperſtitious practices that have prevailed in the chriſtian world, and which has eat out, as it were, the life and ſpirit of Chriſtianity. So that in ſome parts of Chriſtendom there is little elſe remaining, but a blind and ungoverned zeal for poſitive duties, and for ſuch ſuperſtitious practices, as education and cuſtom has rendered ſacred to them. And indeed this evil is apt to ſpread and take root in all places, and at all times. For when men are unwilling to part with their vices, then they are glad to lay hold of any principle which will render the practice of thoſe vices eaſy to themſelves. And nothing ſeems better to anſwer this purpoſe, than to raiſe up the value of poſitive duties to be equal, or perhaps ſuperior to moral duties; and then it is eaſy to ſuppoſe, that to abound in the former, will ſupply the want of the latter; and thus men deceive themſelves to their own deſtruction. Have we not therefore good reaſon to take heed to ourſelves, when ſuch principles are advanced as are not only manifeſtly falſe, but alſo are likely to prove very hurtful to mankind, and, which, I think, is the preſent caſe? The repreſenting poſitive duties, as of equal or ſuperior value with moral duties, is not only a falſe principle, but it has alſo a ſad tendency to miſlead mankind in a point of the utmoſt concern to them.

"To conclude; let me intreat thoſe men, who are for the raiſing the value of poſitive duties much above their true worth, and are for making the uſe of theſe the ground and foundation of Chriſtian perfection, and of our acceptance with God, to conſider what they are doing. Sirs, Are you not by this ſending us back to Popery? That being ſuch a religious conſtitution as abounds with a greater number and variety of poſitive duties, than any religious conſtitution amongſt Proteſtants, and therefore is the more ſure way to Chriſtian perfection. Are you not pointing out to men a way to deceive themſelves, in a caſe wherein their higheſt intereſt is at ſtake, by ſpeaking peace to them, or rather by leading them to view themſelves in a falſe glaſs, and thereby to ſpeak peace unto themſelves, whilſt their hands are full of fraud and violence, and their hearts run after their covetouſneſs? whereas, in truth, there is no peace to the wicked, ſaith our God. For if poſitive duties are repreſented as of equal or ſuperior excellency and value to moral duties, then men are very eaſily led to think, that a conſtant attendance on, and a warm zeal for poſitive duties, will render them moſt acceptable to their Maker, tho' they are deſtitute of that rectitude of mind and life, which the chriſtian religion recommends, and which the reaſon of things requires, as the only ground of divine acceptance. And this has too often been the caſe, as the experience of almoſt all ages hath ſhewn; ſo that, by this means, men have deceived themſelves to their undoing. Theſe, I think, are conſequences which may very eaſily follow the principle I have now been oppoſing the advancing of, which looks as if we were ſetting our faces towards Rome, and were longing to return again to the fleſh-pots of Egypt: but how ſubſervient ſoever this may be to anſwer the purpoſes of a deſigning clergy, yet ſurely it is highly injurious to the religion of Chriſt (3)."

(3) Chubb's Tracts, vol. iii. p. 55—58.

[D] Sufficient to guide him to God's Favour, and the Happineſs of another World.] When our author firſt aſſerted the ſufficiency of reaſon in matters of religion, he expreſsly declared that he did not intend, by any thing he ſaid, to injure divine revelation, or to ſerve the cauſe of infidelity; and he offered ſome conſiderations to ſhew, that what he had advanced could not any way contribute to ſuch an end. Still, however, an outcry was made, that this exalting of reaſon (as it was called) was certainly deſigned to anſwer the purpoſes which he had diſavowed; and, therefore, he thought it expedient to explain himſelf more particularly in the preſent treatiſe. Accordingly, he begins with ſtating the point in debate. "The ſufficiency of reaſon," ſays he "is now controverted; and the queſtion is, what it is, that reaſon is ſufficient for; or what is meant, by thoſe who maintain the ſufficiency of reaſon; or that reaſon, is a ſufficient guide in matters of religion. And the anſwer in ſhort is this, viz. That reaſon (where divine revelation is not) when carefully uſed and followed, is ſufficient to guide men to God's favour, and the happineſs of another world: in oppoſition to that abſolute neceſſity of a divine revelation, which ſuppoſes, that it is impoſſible, or at leaſt that it is exceeding difficult, and next to impoſſible, for a man to obtain God's favour, and the happineſs of another world, who has only his reaſoning faculty to guide him, and who has not the help of a divine revelation. Whether reaſon be ſufficient to diſcover a compleat ſyſtem of morality, or whether it be ſufficient to any other purpoſe, is not the preſent queſtion: if it be ſufficient to guide men to God's favour, and the happineſs of another world; then, it anſwers the moſt valuable purpoſes to them; and this is all that I am concerned to make good." That reaſon, (where there is no divine revelation) when carefully uſed and followed, is ſufficient to anſwer the purpoſes aforeſaid, appeared to Mr. Chubb very plain and evident. That he tells us it was which diſpoſed him to endeavour to make it plain and evident to others; and he declares that he did this with a kind intention, and from a regard to truth. In the proſecution of his deſign, he firſt ſhews what thoſe principles are from which he reaſons, and, in his own opinion, proves them to be well grounded. Having laid this foundation, he next points out the conſequences which naturally and neceſſarily follow from theſe principles; and hence he preſumes it will appear, that reaſon is ſufficient to anſwer the purpoſes of religion. From the whole he deduces the three following obſervations.

"Firſt, When I ſay, that reaſon is, or may be, to every man who is not wanting to himſelf, a ſufficient guide in matters of religion; I mean, that it is, or may be ſo to every individual of our ſpecies, who is anſwerable to God for his actions. For, if any of our ſpecies, thro' a defect in their conſtitutions, or thro' any tion did not appear by itself, but was subjoined to an "Enquiry concerning the "Grounds and Reasons, or what those Principles are, on which two of our anniversary "Solemnities are founded, viz. That on the 30th of January, being the Day of the "Martyrdom of King Charles the First, appointed to be kept as a Day of fasting; "and that on the 5th of November, being the Day of our Deliverance from Popery "and Slavery, by the happy Arrival of his late Majesty King William the Third, ap-"pointed to be kept as a Day of Thansgiving." This piece was occasioned by a sermon of Dr. Croxall's, preached before the House of Commons, on the 30th of January, 1729; and the design of Mr. Chubb was to shew, that the two anniversaries are founded upon two contradictory and incompatible principles; principles, which are as opposite and contrary to each other as light is to darkness. Our author's next publication, which was in 1734, was a work consisting of four tracts, viz. I. "An Enquiry "concerning the Books of the New Testament, whether they were written by divine "Inspiration, according to the vulgar Use of that Expression; that is, whether the "Minds of the Writers were under such a divine Direction, as that Almighty God "immediately revealed to, and impressed upon them the subject Matter therein con-"tained [E]." II. "Some short Remarks on Britannicus's Letters, published in the "London any disadvantageous circumstances they may be in, are uncapable of discerning the preferableness of one thing or action to another; or if their constitutions or circumstances are such, as render it unreasonable to expect that they should; to such persons, I do not say, that reason is a sufficient guide in matters of religion, or indeed any guide at all. But then, as these men's understandings cannot, or at least it is not reasonable to expect that they should, be of any advantage to them, as to the favour of God, and their souls happiness in another world: so on the other side, it is unreasonable to suppose that they will be any disadvantage to them in these respects; and if so, then such persons are not accountable, and will not be the subjects of a future judgment. The case is the same, with respect to any particular branch of duty. If through any defect in the constitution, or any bad circumstances a person may be in, he is rendered uncapable of discerning the fitness or unfitness of this, or that action; or if it be unreasonable to expect that he should; then, under those circumstances, he is most certainly excusable; because the reason of the thing requires that he should be excused: and consequently, in these instances he is not accountable. As to those motives to action, arising from our future existence, and a future judgment, supposing these were not discoverable by our reasoning faculties, (which I have shewn they are, and that the certainty of these points is founded in reason;) yet, reason would be a sufficient guide in matters of religion; because the reasonableness of an action, is a proper ground of action to a reasonable being, and ought to determine his will to the choice of that action, supposing no other motive intervened to invite him to it, and it ought to determine his will, in opposition to all temptations to the contrary; because the reasonableness of an action is more than a balance to all temptations. I say, this ought in reason to be the case; but whether it will be so in fact or not, depends upon the pleasure of each individual. And if the reasonableness of an action, be the sole ground and reason of a man's performing that action; then, in that instance, he will be highly pleasing and most acceptable to his Maker; because in such a case, he acts from the best and most noble principle, even from that which is the sole ground and reason of action to God. Again,

"Secondly, When I say, that reason is a sufficient guide in matters of religion, I do not intend by this to exclude the use of divine revelation. The use and design of a divine revelation, is to rouse up men from their sloth and security; to bring them to consideration and reflection; to assist their enquiries, and to facilitate that work; to present to their view that rule of action, which the reason of things requires they should govern their behaviour by; to awaken in men a just sense of the trust that is reposed in them, and the obligations they are under both to God and to each other; to call those who live viciously, to repentance and reformation of their evil ways; and to represent to them the certain consequences of a good and a bad life, with regard to divine favour or displeasure: these and the like, are the gracious purposes which a divine revelation is intended to serve; and these are the manifest designs of the Christian revelation. And when such a divine revelation is given, it is a very great favour and advantage to those who enjoy it; but what has this to do with those who have it not? Are they to be considered as accountable creatures, and yet destitute of ability sufficient to render them pleasing to their Maker? No, surely. The very supposition is monstrous, and carries with it a most horrid reflection upon the moral character of Almighty God.

"Thirdly, When I say reason is a sufficient guide in matters of religion, I mean reason called into use and exercise, and not reason neglected or set aside in that respect. Reason, when it is rightly used, and duly applied, and when men direct and govern their affections and actions according to it, must needs be a sufficient guide in matters of religion, as I have shewn above. But, if a man does not carefully and duly exercise and apply his reasoning faculty to the subject of religion, but on the contrary neglects it, or sets it aside, and takes upon him to follow other guides, viz. the tradition of his fathers, the custom of the age and country in which he lives, and the like; then, and in that case, I am so far from affirming that reason is practically a sufficient guide in matters of religion, that on the contrary, I allow, that in fact, it may not be any guide at all. And, supposing this to be the case, with much the greater part, or even all our species, what is it to the purpose? Is reason the less a guide, or is it less sufficient to answer the purpose of a guide to mankind; because much the greater part, or even all our species does not, or will not make use of it, to answer that end? No, surely. A means, though never so well adapted to attain its end, is yet not proximately and practically sufficient to obtain that end, except it be properly and carefully used to answer that purpose. Suppose, for instance, that the Christian revelation, when carefully attended to and followed, be excellently adapted to guide men to happiness: yet, it is not in fact sufficient for this purpose, except men attend to it, and make it a rule of action to themselves (4)."

[E] And impressed upon them the subject matter therein contained.] Concerning the books of the New Testament, Mr. Chubb was of opinion, that they were not written by divine inspiration, according to the vulgar use of that expression. He did not think that the minds of the writers were under such a divine direction in drawing up their histories and epistles, (the book of St. John's Revelation excepted) as that God immediately revealed to, and impressed upon them the subject matter therein contained; but only that they were under a firm belief and expectation of a future judgment and retribution, and so were disposed, at their utmost peril, to give, (as accordingly they did) to the best of their ability, an honest and faithful account of matters of fact, which in the main were strictly true, according to what they themselves had heard and seen, or upon the best information they could receive from others, who were eye witnesses, and ministers or attendants on the Messiah, allowing

" London Journal of the 4th and 11th of April, 1724; and republiſhed in the Journals " of the 5th and 12th of April, 1729; containing an Argument drawn from the ſingle " Fact of Chriſt's Reſurrection, to prove the Divinity of his Miſſion. Wherein is " ſhewn, that Britannicus's Argument does not anſwer the Purpoſe for which it was " intended: And in which is likewiſe ſhewn, what was the great and main End that " the Reſurrection of Chriſt was intended to be ſubſervient to; viz. not to prove the " Divinity of his Miſſion, for that was ſufficiently done before, but to gather together " his Diſciples, to commiſſion, and qualify, and ſend them forth to preach his Goſpel " to all Nations." " The Equity and " Reaſonableneſs of a future Judgment exemplified: or a Diſcourſe on the Parable of " the unmerciful Servant, as it is related in Matthew xviii. verſe 23, to the End of " the Chapter." With reſpect to the firſt of theſe four pieces, however different Mr. Chubb's ideas, concerning the inſpiration of the New Teſtament, might be from thoſe generally admitted by Chriſtian Divines, his views were by no means inconſiſtent with a firm belief in our holy religion. Similar ſentiments have been entertained by men who have been the moſt eminently diſtinguiſhed for their attachment to our Saviour's ſupernatural authority. Mr. Chubb, in his ſecond tract, appears to have manifeſted a farther ſymptom than he had hitherto done of that ſceptical diſpoſition, which afterwards carried him to ſtill greater lengths. For ſurely it was a ſtrange doctrine, to allow the truth of the reſurrection of Chriſt, and, at the ſame time, to deny that it was intended to prove the divinity of his miſſion. It is not eaſy to conceive of an aſſertion that can be more contrary to reaſon, or to ſcripture. To a mind not bewildered in ſophiſtry, the fact of our Lord's reſurrection, if ſincerely believed, muſt ever be conſidered as the moſt indubitable evidence of his commiſſion from above; and in this light it is invariably repreſented throughout the writings of the New Teſtament.

In the following year, our author produced another performance, the title of which was, " Some Obſervations offered to public Conſideration: occaſioned by the Oppoſi- " tion made to Dr. Rundle's Election to the See of Glouceſter. In which the Credit of " the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament is particularly conſidered." To which are added three Tracts, viz. I. " An Anſwer to Mr. Stone's ſecond Remarks on the Caſe of " Abraham, with regard to his being commanded by God to offer up his Son Iſaac in " Sacrifice: In a ſecond Letter to the Rev. Mr. Stone, Fellow of the learned Society " of Wadham College, in Oxford." II. " A Diſcourſe on Sincerity: Wherein is " ſhewn, that Sincerity affords juſt Ground for Peace and Satisfaction in a Man's own " Mind, and renders his Conduct juſtly approvable to every other intelligent Being. allowing a poſſibility of miſtake in ſmaller circumſtances. The doctrines they delivered, and the duties they required, were ſuch as they themſelves had verbally received from the mouth of Chriſt; or by thoſe who had thus received them from him; or by a ſpecial revelation from God; or by inferences drawn from the writings of the Old Teſtament; or from the reaſon of things, and the like. Such was our Author's opinion; and in this tract, he lays before his readers the grounds and reaſons upon which it was founded (5).

[F] In a letter to the Rev. Mr. Stone.] Mr. Chubb, in his " Caſe of Abraham conſidered," had obſerved, that as Abraham ſtood to Iſaac in the relation of a father, he became hence naturally obliged to guard and protect that life which, by a voluntary act, he had been the inſtrument of introducing; or it was right and fit, in the nature of the thing, that Abraham ſhould guard and protect it. This obligation being thus founded iu nature; and it being alſo independent of, and antecedent to any divine command, our author thought it would unavoidably follow, that no ſubſequent divine command could poſſibly cancel or take off the aforeſaid natural obligation. It was, he aſſerted, a manifeſt abſurdity, and a contradiction in terms, to ſay that a natural obligation ariſes from, or is deſtroyed by a divine command; for if it depends upon a divine command, then it is not a natural obligation in the ſenſe in which that term is here uſed. And, if the divine command could not make void the natural obligation which Abraham was under, then Mr. Chubb thinks it will follow, that the giving of ſuch a command, with an intent that it ſhould be obeyed, muſt be wrong; and conſequently, that obedience to ſuch a command muſt be wrong alſo. But he concludes, that God did not intend that the command to Abraham ſhould be obeyed, as is evident by his recalling it;—and this our Author takes to be the ſtate of the caſe.

" Theſe and other obſervations had given occaſion to a " Sermon and Remarks" on the ſubject, by the Rev. Mr. Stone, Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford; a copy of which he preſented to Mr. Chubb, who, in return, addreſſed the letter mentioned above, to his Reverend Adverſary, with a view of reſtoring the caſe of Abraham to its native plainneſs and ſimplicity, by removing that cloud which he apprehended Mr. Stone had drawn over it (6).

[G] The eternal duration of puniſhment to the wicked is particularly conſidered.] Our Author, in his diſcourſe on the equity and reaſonableneſs of a future judgment, had offered ſome remarks on the doctrine of a perpetual and endleſs duration to the puniſhment of the wicked; which doctrine ſeemed to him to undermine, or at leaſt to weaken the certainty of a future judgment and retribution. That, however, not being the chief deſign which he had then in view, he did not enter fully into the queſtion; for which reaſon, as well as becauſe his obſervations had not given general ſatisfaction, he now reaſſumed the ſubject; and having more particularly examined it, he ſubmitted his ſentiments to public conſideration, by way

The caſe of Dr. Rundle was this: He was accuſed, and, as we ſhall ſee when we come to his article, falſely accuſed of having, in a private converſation, fifteen years before it was propoſed to make him Biſhop of Glouceſter, declared his diſbelief of that branch of Hiſtory in which God is ſaid to tempt Abraham, by requiring him to offer up his ſon Iſaac for a burnt-offering. Mr. Chubb, however, did not enter into the queſtion whether Dr. Rundle did or did not believe the hiſtory, or whether he had made the declaration with which he was charged. His only deſign is to ſhew, that ſuppoſing any man's election to the office of a Chriſtian Biſhop ſhould be oppoſed on the ground now mentioned, ſuch an oppoſition would be very weak and unjuſtifiable (l). Our author's next publication, which appeared in 1737, was, "The Equity and Reaſonableneſs of the divine Conduct in pardoning Sinners upon their Repentance exemplified: Or a Diſcourſe on the Parable of the Prodigal Son. In which thoſe Doctrines, viz. that Men are rendered acceptable to God, and that Sinners are recommended to Mercy, either by the perfect Obedience, or the meritorious Sufferings, or by the prevailing Interceſſion of Chriſt, or by one, or other, or all of theſe, are particularly conſidered, and refuted. Occaſioned by Dr. Butler's late Book, entitled, The Analogy of Religion natural and revealed to the Conſtitution and Courſe of Nature. Offered to the Conſideration of the Clergy, among all Denominations of Chriſtians [H]. To which are added two Diſſertations, viz. I. Concerning the Senſe and Meaning of St. Paul's Words, Titus iii. 10, 11. A Man that is an Heretic, after the firſt and ſecond Admonition, reject: Knowing that he that is ſuch, is ſubverted, and ſinneth, being condemned of himſelf. II. Concerning the Time for keeping a Sabbath. Offered to the Conſideration of the Sabbatarians. In a Letter to Mr. Ellwall. To which is likewiſe added, The Caſe of pecuniary Mulcts, with regard to Diſſenters, particularly conſidered. In a ſecond Letter to the Rev. Dr. Stebbing."

Mr. Chubb, in the courſe of his various publications, had frequently taken occaſion to return to what he calls "the delightful employment of vindicating the moral character of ALMIGHTY GOD; and he had exerted himſelf in the ſupport of what he "eſteemed the true dignity of human nature." But though he always expreſſed a becoming concern for the juſt rights of that reaſon and underſtanding which the gracious Author of our exiſtence has been pleaſed to beſtow upon us, he did not intend, in ſo doing, to exclude the uſe of divine revelation. Indeed, whatever may be thought of his ſentiments concerning various diſputed points in theology, he appears to have had very much at heart the intereſts of our holy religion, and to have been deſirous of ſeeing it fairly exhibited to the world, in its original purity (m). With this profeſſed view it was, that he publiſhed, in 1738, a treatiſe, entitled, "The true Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt aſſerted: "Wherein is ſhewn, what is and what is not that Goſpel; what was the great and good "End it was intended to ſerve; how it is excellently ſuited to anſwer that Purpoſe, and "how, or by what Means, that End has in a great Meaſure been fruſtrated. Humbly "offered to public Conſideration, and in particular to all thoſe who eſteem themſelves, "or are eſteemed by others, to be Miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt, and Preachers of his "Goſpel; and more eſpecially to all thoſe who have obtained the Reputation of being "the great Defenders of Chriſtianity. To which is added, A ſhort Diſſertation on "Providence." The principal points which fell under our author's examination, in this performance, are evidently of the greateſt importance to mankind; and, accordingly, he proteſts, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that he had purſued his ſubject with all poſſible fairneſs and freedom, with a ſtrict adherence to truth, and with a ſerious regard to a future judgment and retribution. Theſe diſpoſitions he wiſhed to ſee prevailing in ſuch perſons as ſhould think fit to examine his work; in which caſe he did not doubt that what was offered by him would appear in a different light, and have a different effect upon their minds than it would otherwiſe have [I]. He was alſo of opinion, way of Supplement to that Tract. His opinion, with regard to this important object, is, that the eternal duration of the torments of the wicked is neither required by the grounds nor the ends of puniſhment; and, therefore, that ſuch a diſtribution of it would not be a juſt, wiſe, or good adminiſtration of government. This opinion he gives fairly, freely, and fully; and having ſet forth the reaſons on which it is founded, he modeſtly ſubmits the whole to the judgment of his readers (7).

(7) Brit. Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 384, 385.

[H] Offered to the conſideration of the clergy.] The uſe which our Author makes of this diſcourſe is, to deſire and entreat the clergy among all the denominations of Chriſtians, that they would take the matter into their moſt ſerious conſideration, it being a point of the utmoſt concern. "I have here ſhewn, ſays "he, what it is which Chriſt hath declared to be the "true and only ground upon which ſinners will obtain God's mercy, viz. by repentance and reformation of their evil ways, or the being ſo changed, "as to ceaſe to be the objects of God's diſpleaſure, "and to become perſonally and in themſelves the "proper objects of his mercy and kindneſs. This is "the only way declared by Jeſus Chriſt, by which "ſinners can be ſaved. Whoever, therefore, points "out to ſinners any other way to God's mercy than "this way declared by Jeſus Chriſt, ſuch a one in "effect preaches another goſpel than what Chriſt "hath preached, and points out to ſinners another "way to God's mercy and life eternal, than what "Chriſt hath pointed out unto them; which as it "muſt be greatly wrong in itſelf, ſo it may be "greatly injurious to the ſouls of men (8)."

(8) Brit. Biog. ubi ſupra.

[I] And have a different effect upon their minds than it would otherwiſe have.] In this famous treatiſe, Mr. Chubb firſt ſhews, "that the great and profeſſed deſign of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as to his coming into the world, and with reſpect to what he "has revealed to it, performed in it, and ſuffered "from it and for it, is manifeſtly this, viz. to ſave "men's nion, that by ſeparating the goſpel of Chriſt from thoſe things which have been blended with it, and which have laid a foundation for moſt of the difficulties and objections that have been urged againſt it, he had rendered it defenſible upon rational principles. Indeed, however objectionable his treatiſe may be in certain reſpects, it can ſcarcely be denied that it contains many juſt remarks and admirable reflections; particularly, on the genuine ſpirit of our holy religion, the nature of our Saviour's kingdom, and the various corruptions of Chriſtianity (n). It was not to be expected that Mr. Chubb's "True Goſpel" ſhould eſcape animadverſion and cenſure. It was attacked from various quarters; in ſome caſes with great aſperity, in others with moderation and candour. It was chiefly to the latter kind of theſe antagoniſts, who, without uſing reproachful language, thought that he had brought our holy religion into a much narrower compaſs than he ought to have done, that he judged fit to reply without delay, in a piece, entitled, "The true Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt vindicated. And alſo a "Vindication of the Author's ſhort Diſſertation on Providence." In the former part of this publication, Mr. Chubb, having recapitulated what he had advanced in his "True Goſpel," and ſhewn the reaſons on which it was founded, replies to various objections of his opponents. This he doth with candour and ſimplicity, profeſſing the moſt ſincere attachment to truth, and earneſtly diſclaiming every thought and intention of miſleading the reader in a matter of ſuch vaſt importance (o). Still, however, his adverſaries multiplied againſt him. He determined, therefore, to reſume his examination of ſome of the moſt important points which he had diſcuſſed in his "True Goſpel."

(n) Ibid. p. 389, 390.

"men's ſouls, that is, to prepare men for, and to enſure to them the favour of God, and their happineſs in another world, and to prevent them from bringing great and laſting miſery upon themſelves." He then proceeds to obſerve, that "this was an end moſt excellent in itſelf, and moſt worthy of him who undertook the proſecution of it; and conſequently, that our Lord Jeſus Chriſt is, under God, the greateſt benefactor to our ſpecies, provided the means made uſe of by him are ſuitable and proper to obtain the end propoſed." This leads him to enquire, "how, or in what way, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt propoſes to ſave men's ſouls; that is, what method he hath taken to prepare men for, and to enſure to them the favour of God, and their happineſs in another world." In the courſe of this enquiry, having, as he ſuppoſes, clearly aſcertained what is the true goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, he points out, by the way, in one or two inſtances, what is not that goſpel; and then, conſidering farther the ſteps which Jeſus took, in order to render the goſpel effectual for the gracious purpoſe it was intended to ſerve, he fully ſhews that the means made uſe of were all ſuitable and proper to obtain the end propoſed. Hence he is naturally led to examine, how it comes to paſs, that when the Chriſtian revelation was firſt publiſhed to the world, it was not univerſally received; and alſo how it happens, that where it is received, it does not generally have its proper effect upon the minds and lives of men. He concludes the whole with recommending to his readers a ſerious and practical regard to a future retribution; with a view to promote which good end, he lays before them the principles upon which the certainty of a judgment to come is founded (p).

(p) Brit. Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 389, 390.

The ingenious and ſingular Author of the "Life of John Buncle," and of the "Memoirs of ſeveral Ladies of Great Britain," hath repreſented one of his beautiful female characters (Miſs Maria Howel) as making the following ſtrictures on Mr. Chubb's "True Goſpel."

"Another day, during my ſtay at her mother's houſe, at this time, 1741, I found her reading Chubb's true Goſpel aſſerted, and aſked her, how ſhe liked that book? I think, Sir, Maria replied, that he writes beautifully, and I take him to be a wiſe and good man: but in ſome things I apprehend he has gone too far, and aſſerted, what he could not prove.

"What is it, Miſs, I ſaid, that you diſlike in Mr. Chubb? He is greatly eſteemed in England by the wiſeſt men: they think this book has done ſome ſervice to true religion.

"It is valuable, this charming young creature anſwered, in many reſpects. But, Sir, is he not wrong in confining the good tidings to a ſmall part of the goſpel only, without regarding the prophecies of the Old Teſtament; and in order to a right underſtanding of the writings of the Apoſtles, ſhould he not take in the whole canon of the New Teſtament? Our Lord ſays, the Spirit ſhould abide with the holy penmen, lead them into all truth, and teach them things they were not able to bear in his life-time, but would be able to bear after his reſurrection, and the effuſion of the Spirit; when their underſtanding was enlightened, and their faith eſtabliſhed; and after this, to doubt the credit of the apoſtles in ſome things, and ſuppoſe they might any where write their own fancies inſtead of the doctrines of heaven; does it not tend to a ſubverſion of our religion? It appears ſo to me. It makes Mr. Chubb ſeem an inconſiſtent Chriſtian. I likewiſe think, that this gentleman does not lay ſtreſs enough on the Meſſiah's being come, and that Jeſus is the Meſſiah. To be a Chriſtian, is it ſufficient to have a perſuaſion of this writer's doctrinal propoſitions? ——Is not ſomething more required from us, than to believe we are obliged by the goſpel, to conform our minds and lives to the eternal and unalterable rule of action, which is founded in the reaſon of things; to repent and reform, if we have violated this law; and to expect a day of judgment, for rewards and puniſhments, in proportion to our having, or not having conformed to this rule of righteouſneſs? Theſe propoſitions are, to be ſure, the main part of the true goſpel. They are not the whole of it, as I apprehend.

"Theſe juſt remarks on Mr. Chubb's book, made by this fine young creature, amazed and charmed me, as her mother aſſured me, ſhe had never hinted any thing of the kind to her daughter; and I then proceeded to aſk her, what ſhe thought of this gentleman's other writings, as I ſaw they were all lying about the houſe? Think, Sir, Maria replied; as I conceive, he was a bright man, but as often out as in. What he ſays, in his other writings, of inſpiration, the reſurrection of Chriſt, and the caſe of Abraham, in being commanded of God to offer his ſon, I cannot aſſent to. He is wrong, if I think right. Here ſhe proceeded to lay before me his notion and her notion of inſpiration; what he ſaid of the reſurrection, and what ſhe thought of that matter: She came to Abraham and Iſaac next, and to my admiring mind, not only confuted my ſage friend, the excellent Mr. Chubb, but, laid before me many new and fine things upon the occaſions (10)."

(10) Memoirs of ſeveral Ladies of Great-Britain, vol. i. p. 123—126. Edition of 1769.

In the diſſertation on Providence, annexed to the "True Goſpel," Mr. Chubb admits, that God, upon ſome extraordinary occaſions, to anſwer ſome great and good ends, may immediately interpoſe to bring about ſuch events as are neceſſary to anſwer thoſe purpoſes; which events would not have been brought about in the courſe of his general Providence. But that the ſupreme Being ſhould be frequently and almoſt perpetually immediately be interpoſing in the affairs of the world, our author thinks is unlikely in itſelf, and, therefore, juſtly to be diſputed.

pel." But, to avoid entering into a wrangling controverſy with the numerous writers who appeared againſt him, he choſe to repreſent to them the ſolid grounds on which true religion is founded. This was the deſign of his tract, which was publiſhed in 1740, under the title of "An Enquiry into the Ground and Foundation of Religion. "Wherein is ſhewn, that Religion is founded in Nature. That is, that there is a Right "and Wrong, a true and falſe Religion in Nature: And that Nature or Reaſon af- "fords plain, obvious, certain Principles, by which a Man may diſtinguiſh theſe, and "form a proper Judgment in the Caſe; and which an honeſt upright Man may ſafely "and ſecurely ſtay his Mind upon; amidſt the various and contrary Opinions that "prevail in the World, with regard to this Subject. To which are added, I. A Poſt- "ſcript, occaſioned by the Publication of Dr. Stebbing's Viſitation Charge, that had "been delivered to the Clergy of the Archdeaconry of Wilts. II. A ſhort Diſſerta- "tion on Matt. xix. 21.—Occaſioned by Dr. Stebbing's unjuſt and groundleſs Reflexion "on the Author, with regard to this Text, in the aforeſaid Charge. III. An Anſwer "to a private Letter, from a Stranger to the Author, on the Subject of God's Fore- "knowledge." There are three things which Mr. Chubb endeavours to eſtabliſh in this performance; firſt, that nature points out the reaſonableneſs of piety and devotion; ſecondly, that it makes known the true grounds of men's acceptance with God; and thirdly, that it aſcertains the means by which they may render themſelves the proper objects of his mercy and kindneſs. Our author's next publication, which was in 1741, was "A Diſcourſe on Miracles, conſidered as Evidences to prove the divine "Original of a Revelation. Wherein is ſhewn, what Kind and Degree of Evidence "ariſes from them, and in which the various Reaſonings on thoſe Queſtions that relate "to the Subject are fairly repreſented. To which is added an Appendix, containing an "Enquiry into this Queſtion, viz. Whether the Doctrines of a future State of Exiſ- "tence to Men, and a future Retribution, were plainly and clearly taught by Moſes "and the Prophets. Humbly offered to the Conſideration of the Rev. Dr. * War- "burton, and all others that particularly intereſt themſelves in this Queſtion." In this diſcourſe Mr. Chubb profeſſes to take a view of the ſubject conſidered ſimply in itſelf, without regard to any particular revelation, or to any particular miracle; and his concluſion, upon the whole, is, that miracles, under the moſt advantageous circumſtances, cannot, in the nature of the thing, afford certain, but only probable proof, that a revelation is divine (p). It might juſtly be expected, that many of our author's readers would diſſent from this concluſion. Mr. Le Moine publiſhed an anſwer, in 1747, which Dr. Leland conſiders as a ſolid and full confutation of Mr. Chubb's diſcourſe (q). We believe there are few intelligent men, that have impartially examined the matter, who will not acknowledge that the principles of that diſcourſe (though without any particular reference to it) are clearly refuted in two excellent works, Dr. Douglas's "Criterion," and Mr. Farmer's Treatiſe on Miracles.

* He was at that time only Mr. Warburton.

In 1743, our author again appeared from the preſs, in "An Enquiry concerning "Redemption. Wherein the Chriſtian Redemption is particularly conſidered. To "which is prefixed a Preface; wherein is ſhewn, That if Chriſtianity be not founded "in Argument, but on thoſe divine Impreſſions that are made on Men's Minds con- "cerning it, (as a late ingenious author has attempted to prove) then it is moſt uncer- "tain and precarious, and cannot be reduced to any ſtandard. And in which is alſo "ſhewn, that Chriſt's Kingdom has been ſo far from being ſupported, and eſtabliſhed "by the Interpoſition of Civil Power; that, on the contrary, it has rather been an- "nihilated thereby." In the concluſion of his preface, Mr. Chubb makes ſome ſtrictures (r) on Mr. Warburton, who had ranked him, with other freethinkers, among the mortal foes both of reaſon and religion, injured wit as well as virtue. To a charge ſo ſevere, he anſwers with due ſpirit; and declares, that he had ſincerely and uprightly endeavoured to promote the cauſe of reaſon, religion, and virtue; and that with regard to injured wit, if he had done nothing for it, he had done nothing againſt it. In the enquiry concerning redemption, the principal points inſiſted upon by him are theſe: that penitence is the only ground of God's mercy to ſinners; and that this doctrine is true chriſtianity, ſo far as the evangelical diſpenſation is concerned with the grounds of men's acceptance with God, and of ſinners obtaining the divine mercy (s).

(s) Brit. Biog. ubi ſupra, p. 395.

The tracts that Mr. Chubb had printed ſince the publication of his firſt collection, in quarto, having now become pretty numerous, he had formed a deſign of collecting them into a ſecond volume; which he intended to cloſe with a diſcourſe, entitled, "The Author's Farewell to his Readers;" wherein he propoſed to take his leave of the world as a writer. But having been diverted, by his friends, from executing the latter part of this ſcheme, he purpoſed to conclude the volume with the Treatiſe on Redemption (t). For what reaſons we know not, the deſign was never accompliſhed. Mr. Chubb's next publication (u) was "The Ground and Foundation of Morality "conſidered. Wherein is ſhewn, That a diſintereſted Benevolence is a proper and a "worthy Principle of Action to intelligent Beings. And in which is alſo ſhewn, What "ſome of thoſe abſurd and bad Conſequences are, which naturally and obviouſly fol-

To which is added, The firſt Section of the Author's Farewell to his " Readers; namely, The Introduction."—If all Mr. Chubb's writings had been as unexceptionable as his anſwer to Dr. Rutherforth, he would have been entitled to every degree of praiſe. But it was his misfortune that he grew more and more unſettled in his religious opinions, the farther he advanced in life. This diſpoſition was too apparent in the laſt work publiſhed by himſelf, which came out in 1746, under the title of " Four Diſſertations, viz. I. On the Hiſtory of Melchizedek. From which it appears, that Abraham did not give Tithes to Melchizedek, but Melchizedek to " Abraham. II. On the Temper and Behaviour of Eſau and Jacob, the two Sons of " the Patriarch Iſaac. Whereby it appears, that Eſau was much the better Man. " III. On the Conduct of Balaam. In which that Prophet's Character is cleared of " thoſe Reproaches and Imputations wherewith it has been ſtained. IV. On Dr. Sherlock, Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury's Aſſertion, Thus far all is well: as grounded upon, " or as an Inference or Concluſion drawn from the following Premiſes, namely, And " the People (of Izrael) ſerved the Lord all the Days of Joſhua, and all the Days of the " Elders that outlived Joſhua, who had ſeen all the great Works of the Lord that he did " for Izrael; which Premiſes are the Text to his Lordſhip's Sermon, lately publiſhed. " Inſcribed to Mr. Samuel Dicker, of Walton, in Surrey." Perhaps there was no treatiſe of our author, his poſthumous works excepted, which gave ſuch great and general offence as theſe four diſſertations. They were particularly exceptionable in the eyes of the clergy, who conſidered them as an irreverent attack upon the ſacred writings, which could ſerve only to excite doubts and ſuſpicions, with reſpect to the divine authority of thoſe ineſtimable records. Mr. Chubb hath certainly, in ſome inſtances, laid himſelf open to a cenſure of this kind; and, in others, the captious pertneſs of his remarks can only be equalled by the ignorance which gave them birth. Nevertheleſs, he declares, that truth is the only point at which he aimed; and it is but juſtice to take notice, that the grounds of his enquiry into ſeveral queſtions he has here diſcuſſed, and the obſervations he has made upon them, ſeem evidently to have been a profound veneration of the SUPREME MIND, and an ardent deſire, as he himſelf expreſſes it, " to take off thoſe groundleſs imputations, wherewith men have ſtained the " beautiful and ſpotleſs character of God moſt high (w)."

Among other charges which the adverſaries of Mr. Chubb alledged againſt him, one was, that his works were the productions of a needy ſcribbler, who wrote for bread. To this accuſation he modeſtly anſwered, that he was under no ſuch neceſſity; for though he had, for ſome time paſt, lived independently of labour, he was principally indebted for it to the bounty of his friends, whoſe kindneſs, he tells us, had enabled him to procure thoſe neceſſaries of ſubſiſtence, which were ſuitable to that rank in the world, wherein he was placed (x). His demands muſt have been exceedingly moderate, ſince he never affected to appear in any other than a very humble ſtation. To the laſt period of his life, he delighted in giving aſſiſtance in the trade, which, by Mr. Lawrence's death, devolved on a nephew; not indeed in the making of candles, which muſt be a diſagreeable employment, but in weighing and ſelling them. Our author had the honour of reckoning ſeveral eminent perſons in the liſt of his generous benefactors. Soon after his appearance in the world as a writer, he was introduced into the favour and family of Sir Joſeph Jekyl [K], who made him his companion at his intervals of leiſure. Mr. Whiſton had recommended him to Sir Joſeph (y), who was particularly ſtruck with his " Previous Queſtion with regard to Religion." In this ſituation, Mr. Chubb had an opportunity of becoming known to many of his patron's acquaintance, by whom he was treated with the reſpect which was due to his genius and his virtues, and whoſe liberality he experienced on various occaſions. He did not, however, continue above a year or two in Sir Joſeph Jekyl's family. Being ſtrongly inclined by nature to retirement and contemplation, he ſoon grew weary of converſing much in the world; and though tempted to remain in town by the offer of a genteel ſettlement for life, he choſe rather to return to Saliſbury. The generoſity of his friends, and particularly of Sir Joſeph Jekyl, followed him into his retreat; and their number increaſing, as his reputation extended, he employed the leiſure which their beneficence afforded him, in the purſuit of his favourite ſtudies, being no longer under a neceſſity of having recourſe to his former occupation for a ſubſiſtence (z). Mr. Cheſelden, the eminent Surgeon, was one of his benefactors. That gentleman frequently ſent him ſmall

[K] He was introduced into the favour and family of Sir Joſeph Jekyl.] What particular department Mr. Chubb occupied in Sir Joſeph's houſe, is now difficult to aſcertain. Mr. Whiſton ſays, that this gentleman allowed him an annual ſalary. There is reaſon to believe, that, at leaſt on extraordinary occaſions, he ſometimes waited at his patron's table, as a ſervant out of livery. The writer of this article well remembers being told by an old Clergyman, nearly forty years ago, that an acquaintance of his, who had dined with Sir Joſeph Jekyl, ſaw Mr. Chubb aſſiſting in that capacity, and was grieved to be thus attended upon, by a man of ſuch ſuperior abilities and underſtanding.

preſents, and ſome times ſuits of clothes, which had been little worn, and which Mr. Chubb was well pleaſed to accept, not being in affluent circumſtances. In the latter part of his life, he had an eminent friend in Mr. Samuel Dicker, who offered to ſettle fifty pounds a year upon him, on condition of removing from Saliſbury. But this offer he declined, as he did not at that time ſpend the income of his fortune (a).

(a) Ibid. p. 397. Short Account of Mr. Chubb, p. 10.

The diſapprobation which had been excited by our author's four diſſertations being very great, he ſet himſelf to prepare a vindication of his ſentiments, and of the manner in which he had propoſed them. Whilſt he was thus employed, his health declined ſo faſt, that he did not live to commit what he had written to the preſs. By too intenſe an application to ſtudy, he had not only impaired his ſight, which was always weak; but, as he advanced in years, he brought on frequent complaints in his head; and, at the ſame time, by a diſuſe of his accuſtomed exerciſe, which was much walking, and by an imprudent indulgence of milk-diet, at an improper ſeaſon, he haſtened the decay of a conſtitution that was naturally vigorous. His life, however, was prolonged to his ſixty-eighth year; and, agreeably to the wiſh he had frequently expreſſed, he was happily exempted from many of thoſe evils, which too often aggravate the bitterneſs of death. On the eighth of February, 1746-7, after a ſhort complaint of an unuſual pain in his ſtomach, he ſuddenly breathed his laſt, as he ſat in his chair, having been ſo well, on the ſame day, as to dine abroad with one of his friends (b) *. According to his own direction, he was buried on the right hand of the chancel of St. Edmund's church, in Saliſbury, near the remains of Mr. Lawrence, for whoſe memory he had always entertained the moſt affectionate regard. The eminence of Mr. Chubb's intellectual abilities is generally allowed; and on this account he was not only admired by the reſpectable perſons we have already mentioned, but by Dr. Samuel Clarke, Biſhop Hoadly, Dr. John Hoadly, Arch-deacon Rolleſton, and Mr. Harris. Several of his tracts, when in manuſcript, were ſeen by theſe gentlemen; but they never made the leaſt correction in them, even with regard to orthography, in which our author was deficient. With reſpect to his moral character, he was uniformly diſtinguiſhed by the integrity, ſimplicity, and ſobriety of his manners. Divine worſhip was conſtantly frequented by him, in his own pariſh church, to the time of his death. His deportment was grave, and his aſpect thoughtful; but his converſation was extremely affable and engaging. As to the form of his body, he was of a low ſtature, and inclined to corpulency (c). Soon after Mr. Chubb's deceaſe, a ſhort and faithful account of his life and character was written by a gentleman of Saliſbury. This being much in our author's favour, provoked one Mr. Horler, a Clergyman, to publiſh a pamphlet, entitled, "Memoirs of Mr. Thomas Chubb, late of Saliſbury: or, a fuller and more "faithful Account of his Life, Writings, Character, and Death." The bigotry and malignity of this pamphlet can ſcarcely be equalled, and have never been exceeded. Mr. Horler's falſe and virulent charges were properly expoſed, in a "Vindication of "the Memory of Mr. Chubb, from the ſcurrilous and groundleſs Calumnies ſuggeſted "by a late infamous Libel."

Though we have given ſo full a detail of our Author's writings, the reader's judgment of them cannot properly be formed, without taking into the account his celebrated "Poſthumous Works," which were publiſhed in two volumes, octavo, in 1748, the year after his death. Theſe works have the advantage of having been deliberately finiſhed, tranſcribed, and, for the moſt part, corrected for the preſs, by Mr. Chubb's own hand. Indeed, he ſeems to have expected that they would have appeared in the world during his life; and accordingly, he repreſents them as containing his laſt and moſt mature thoughts on the various points which came under his examination. The firſt of theſe poſthumous volumes begins with a ſhort tract, the title of which is "Remarks on the Scriptures;" and is followed by another tract, ſtill ſhorter, comprizing ſome "Obſervations on the Reverend Mr. Warburton's divine Legation of Moſes." But the greater part of the firſt, and the entire ſecond volume, are taken up with what is called "The Author's Farewell to his Readers;" comprehending a number of treatiſes on the moſt important points of Religion. Theſe are divided into eleven large ſections, and contain a great variety of matter, relative to divine impreſſions, the exiſtence of a Deity; religion, taken in all its views; a future ſtate of exiſtence, a future judgment and retribution, divine revelation in general, prophecy, miracles, the perſonal character of Jeſus Chriſt, and the writings of the Apoſtles. In diſcuſſing theſe momentous ſubjects, Mr. Chubb is juſtly chargeable with frequent inconſiſtency, and ſelf-contradiction. But his poſthumous works, notwithſtanding their evident defects, were much extolled by many perſons; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he diſcovers, through the whole, a ſerious concern for the preſent and future happineſs of mankind, and that ſeveral topics are treated of by him with equal force and propriety. At the ſame time, however, by labouring to ſhew, that we cannot arrive at certainty with regard to the divine original of any external revelation; by arraigning the wiſdom and equity of the Jewiſh diſpenſation; and by endeavouring to invalidate the evidences of Chriſtianity, he hath done what in him lay to unſettle the minds of his readers. After all, he allows it to be probable, that the miſſion of Chriſt was divine. From a general view of the Chriſtian revelation, he thinks this concluſion follows, that Jeſus was probably ſent by God to be an inſtructor to mankind. Thus far he profeſſes to be a believer and a Chriſtian; and as to diſcipleſhip to Chriſt, he thought himſelf concerned to imitate his excellent example, and to follow the wholeſome counſels or precepts, which he had given or recommended to the world (d).

(d) Ibid. p. 398—400.

Notwithſtanding theſe declarations, Mr. Chubb is uſually ranked among the deiſtical writers. In this view he is conſidered by Dr. Leland, who hath employed two long letters on his poſthumous works, and hath made upon them many judicious and important obſervations (e). The excellent and learned Biſhop of Carliſle, (Dr. Edmund Law) beſides making ſeveral incidental ſtrictures on our Author's productions, hath deſcribed him in the following terms. "On this occaſion, I ſhall take the liberty of "offering a few general hints to the admirers of a late diſtinguiſhed writer of this rank, "the celebrated Mr. Chubb; who, notwithſtanding a tolerably clear head, and ſtrong "natural parts; yet by ever aiming at things far beyond his reach; by attempting a "variety of ſubjects, for which his narrow circumſtances, and ſmall compaſs of reading "and knowledge had in a great meaſure diſqualified him; from a faſhionable, but a fal-"lacious, kind of philoſophy, (with which he ſet out, and by which one of his education "might very eaſily be miſled) he fell by degrees to ſuch confuſion in divinity, to ſuch "low quibbling on ſome obſcure paſſages in our tranſlation of the bible, and was re-"duced to ſuch wretched cavils as to ſeveral hiſtorical facts and circumſtances, wherein "a ſmall ſkill either in the languages, or ſciences, might have ſet him right; or a ſmall "ſhare of real modeſty would have ſupplied the want of them, by putting him upon "conſulting thoſe who could, and would have given him proper aſſiſtance;——that he "ſeems to have fallen at laſt into an almoſt univerſal ſcepticiſm; and quitting that former "ſerious and ſedate ſobriety, which gave him credit, contents himſelf with carrying "on a mere farce for ſome time; acts the part of a ſolemn grave buffoon; ſneers at "all things he does not underſtand; and after all his fair profeſſions, and the cæveat he "has entered againſt ſuch a charge, muſt unavoidably be ſet down in the ſeat of the "ſcorner (f)." A more favourable character is drawn of our Author, in the poſtilla to the memoirs of ſeveral ladies of Great-Britain. A reſpectable divine having deſcribed his works, by the language, of the poor endeavours of this honeſt man; his advocate (g) thus ſtands up in his defence. "One might imagine from this, if a ſtranger to Mr. "Chubb's writings, that he was a poor creature, without abilities, and a malicious "writer againſt the Chriſtian religion. Mr. Chubb was no ſuch man. If he had no "learning, he had the gift of a moſt extraordinary underſtanding, and in his writings "has ſhewn very great abilities. There is a beauty and ſtrength in many of his "thoughts, and in all his language, which render him, as a writer, ſuperior in thoſe "reſpects to every one who hath written againſt him: and though he is wrong in ſome "caſes; yet his heart, to my knowledge, was right honeſt, and his pen expreſſed only "the dictates of his conſcience. He was a ſincere good man as ever lived. He really "believed that the ſcheme he had given of the goſpel was true. His notions of In-"ſpiration, the Reſurrection, Abraham, &c. he thought very juſt; and excluſively of "ſuch ſpeculative faults which he could not help, was as good a Chriſtian as any of "his contemporaries; if the eſſence of chriſtianity conſiſts in an exact rectitude of mind "and life, and the worſhip of the ſupreme God, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. This is "the truth of Mr. Chubb's caſe. I knew him well (h)." Whether this encomium may not be carried, in ſome degree, too far; and whether full credit is to be given to ſo romantic a writer as Mr. Amory, (for ſuch was the real name of the author of the Memoirs of ſeveral Ladies, and of John Buncle) we leave to the determination of our judicious and impartial readers.] K.

CHUDLEIGH (Lady MARY), a philoſophic and poetic lady, was the daughter of Richard Lee, Eſq; of Winſlover, in Devonſhire, and born in 1656. She had an education in which literature ſeemed but little regarded, being taught no other than her native language (a); but her fondneſs for books, great application, and uncommon abilities, enabled her to make a conſiderable figure among the literari of her time. She became raviſhed particularly with the charms of poetry, and being married to Sir George Chudleigh, Bart. ſhe had by him, among ſeveral other children, one daughter named Elizabeth Maria, who, dying in the bloom of life, to the great grief of her mother, this lady ſacrificed to her memory in a poem, intituled, A Dialogue between Larinda and Mariſſa. Some time after appeared another evidence of her poetic talent, called, The Ladies Defence, occaſioned by an angry ſermon preached againſt the fair ſex (b). Though ſhe was indeed perfectly in love with the charms of poetry, yet ſhe dedicated ſome part of her time to the ſeverer ſtudies of philoſophy, as appears in the excellent eſſays which ſhe publiſhed in verſe and proſe, in 1710, with a dedication to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs Sophia, then heir apparent to the Britiſh crown; upon which occaſion the Princeſs,

(a) Ballard's Lives of eminent Women, in her article.

(b) Theſe, with many others, were collected into a volume, and printed in 1722.

Princeſs, in her eightieth year, honoured her with a very polite epiſtle in French [A]. Lady Chudleigh ſurvived this addreſs but a very ſhort time, being tranſlated into another world the ſame year, 1710, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She is ſaid to have written, beſide her works in print, ſeveral other things, as tragedies, operas, maſques, &c. of which the manuſcripts are preſerved in the family. She was a lady of great virtue as well as underſtanding, and made the latter ſubſervient to the former.

[A] The Princeſs honoured her with an epiſtle in French.] It runs thus in Engliſh:

Hanover, June 25, 1710.

'Lady Chudleigh,

'You have done me a very great pleaſure in letting 'me know, by your agreeable book, that there is 'ſuch a one as you in England, who has ſo improved 'herſelf, that ſhe can communicate her ſentiments 'in a fine manner to the world. As for me, I do 'not pretend to deſerve the commendations you give 'me; but by the eſteem which I have of your merit 'and good ſenſe, which will always induce me to 'perfectly regard you; and to be, upon all occa-'ſions,

'Your affectionate friend to ſerve you,

'SOPHIA, Electreſs.'

The ſubjects of Lady Chudleigh's eſſays are knowledge, pride, humility, life, death, fear, grief, riches, ſelf-love, juſtice, anger, calumny, friendſhip, love, avarice, ſolitude; in all which (to ſay nothing of the purity and elegance of her pen) ſhe diſcovers an uncommon degree of piety and knowledge, and a noble contempt of thoſe vanities which the generality of her ſex ſo much regard, and ſo eagerly purſue; in which reſpect, ſhe deſerves to be recorded as a worthy benefactor to the cauſe of religion. N.

 [In the collection of Poems, by the moſt eminent Ladies of Great-Britain and Ireland, are ſeveral of Lady Chudleigh's. From a peruſal of them, we are clearly of opinion, that ſhe had not much of that fine fancy which is neceſſary to a truely poetical genius. She was only a woman endued with ſtrong powers of underſtanding, who was capable of expreſſing her ideas in verſe, with a conſiderable degree of force. How great an advocate ſhe was for female knowledge, and how much ſhe preferred the beauties of the mind to thoſe of the body, are particularly apparent from her "Ladies Defence," which paſſed through various editions. As a ſpecimen of her talents, and of her mode of thinking, we ſhall inſert one or two paſſages from this poem.

"Thoſe gen'rous few, whom kinder thoughts inſpire,
And who the happineſs of all deſire;
Who wiſh we were from barb'rous uſage free,
Exempt from toils, and ſhameful ſlavery,
Yet let us, unreprov'd, miſ-ſpend our hours,
And to mean purpoſes employ our nobler pow'rs.
They think, if we our thoughts can but expreſs,
And know but how to work, to dance and dreſs,
It is enough, as much as we ſhou'd mind,
As if we were for nothing elſe deſign'd,
But made, like puppets, to divert mankind.
O that my ſex wou'd all ſuch toys deſpiſe;
And only ſtudy to be good and wiſe;
Inſpect themſelves, and every blemiſh find,
Search all the cloſe receſſes of the mind,
And leave no vice, no ruling paſſion there,
Nothing to raiſe a bluſh, or cauſe a fear:
Their memories with ſolid notions fill,
And let their reaſon dictate to their will;
Inſtead of novels, hiſtories peruſe,
And for their guides the wiſer antients chuſe,
Through all the labyrinths of learning go,
And grow more humble, as they more do know.
By doing this they will reſpect procure,
Silence the men, and laſting fame ſecure;
And to themſelves the beſt companions prove,
And neither fear their malice, nor deſire their love (1)."

"Beauty's a trifle merits not my care,
I'd rather Æſop's ugly viſage wear,
Join'd with his mind, than be a fool and fair.
Brightneſs of thought, and an extenſive view
Of all the wonders nature has to ſhew;
So clear, ſo ſtrong, and ſo enlarg'd a ſight
As can pierce through the gloomy ſhades of night,
Trace the firſt heroes to their dark abodes,
And find the origin of men and Gods:
See empires riſe, and monarchies decay,
And all the changes of the world ſurvey:
The antient and the modern fate of Kings,
From whence their glory, or misfortune ſprings;
Wou'd pleaſe me more, than if in one combin'd,
I'd all the graces of the female kind.
But do not think 'tis an ambitious heat;
To you I'll leave the being rich and great:
Yours be the fame, the profit, and the praiſe;
We'll neither rob you of your vines, nor bays:
Nor will we to dominion once aſpire;
You ſhall be chief, and ſtill yourſelves admire:
The tyrant man may ſtill poſſeſs the throne,
'Tis in our minds that we wou'd rule alone:
Thoſe unſeen empires give us leave to ſway,
And to our reaſon private homage pay:
Our ſtruggling paſſions within bounds confine,
And to our thoughts their proper taſks aſſign.
This is the uſe we wou'd of knowledge make;
You quickly wou'd the good effects partake.
Our converſations it wou'd ſoon refine,
And in our words, and in our actions ſhine:
And by a pow'rful influence on our lives,
Make us good friends, good neighbours, and good wives.
Of this ſome great examples have been ſhown,
Women remarkable for virtue known:
Jealous of honour, and upright of life,
Serene in dangers, and averſe to ſtrife:
Patient when wrong'd, from pride and envy free,
Strangers to falſehood and to calumny;
Of every noble quality poſſeſt:
Well ſkill'd in ſcience, and with wiſdom bleſt.
In antient Greece, where merit ſtill was crown'd,
Some ſuch as theſe in her records were found.
Rome her Lucretia, and her Portia ſhow,
And we to her the fam'd Cornelia owe:
A place with them does great Zenobia claim;
With theſe I cou'd ſome modern ladies name,
Who help to fill the bulky liſts of fame:
Women renown'd for knowledge, and for ſenſe,
For ſparkling wit, and charming eloquence (2)."

From the ſeverity which Lady Chudleigh, in ſome parts of her poem, diſplays againſt the men, we are induced to conjecture, that ſhe was not very happy in marriage.] K.

CHURCHILL (SIR WINSTON), a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed loyalty, and an eminent Hiſtorian in the reign of Charles II. He was deſcended from an antient and very honourable family in Dorſetſhire, who had been owners of land in that county, from a very little after the Norman Conqueſt, down to the time of his birth (a); ſo that in point of deſcent, there was no need of having recourſe to art, in order to give luſtre to a family, which, in itſelf, had all the genuine marks of ſplendor that conſtitute true nobility, viz. a known lineage of worthy perſons through a long ſeries of years, whoſe names are to be found in our records, the only certain evidences of Engliſh gentility [A]. He was the ſon of John Churchill, Eſq; of Minthorn, in Dorſetſhire, a very eminent Lawyer, who added that and other eſtates to thoſe which deſcended to him from his anceſtors, by his ſucceſs in his profeſſion (b), by Sarah, daughter and coheireſs of Sir Henry Winſton, of Standiſton, in Glouceſterſhire, Knt (c). He was born at Wooton Glanvile in Dorſetſhire, ſome time in the year 1620, as ſome ſay (d); but Anthony Wood tells us, that he was born at London, but fixes his birth in the ſame year (e). He was diſtinguiſhed in his youth by the mildneſs and modeſty of his diſpoſition, as well as by a natural turn to learning, which occaſioned his being ſent to St. John's College at Oxford, when he had ſcarcely attained the age of ſixteen (f). He ſtudied there with great induſtry and application, and would probably have betaken himſelf to ſome learned profeſſion, if the diſorders of the times, and the circumſtances of his family, had not obliged him to leave the univerſity ſooner than he intended, and before he had taken a degree (g). He engaged, from principles of loyalty, in the cauſe of his unfortunate Sovereign King Charles I. for which he ſuffered ſeverely in his fortune, and having married while young, Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir John Drake, of Aſhe, in Devonſhire, ſhe was forced to ſeek a refuge in her father's houſe, when Mr. Churchill's undeſerved misfortunes left him none that he could call his own, and there moſt of his children were born, and conſequently were, by the mother's ſide, allied to ſome of the beſt and nobleſt families in this kingdom [B]. [A] The only certain evidences of Engliſh gentility.] A certain German writer, after the battle of Hochſtedt, drew up an account of this family, in the manner of that country, without authorities (1); and therefore, little or no regard ought to be paid to it. The higheſt that, with any appearance of truth, and hiſtorical certainty, can be traced of this line, is Gitto de Leon, a Norman, who flouriſhed, Anno Domini 1055, under William the Baſtard, Duke of Normandy. His ſecond ſon, Wandrill took the ſurname of Courcil from a Lordſhip of that name, of which he was the owner. He had two ſons, Roger and Rowland. From the latter, deſcend the family of Courcils, who have large poſſeſſions in ſeveral provinces of France, at this day. Roger de Courcil attended Duke William in his expedition into this kingdom, and as a reward for his ſervices had lands given him in Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Shropſhire, among which was the Lordſhip of Churchill, as it was afterwards called in the county of Somerſet, the place of his abode (2). This Roger, by his wife Gertrude, daughter to Sir Guy de Torbay, had John his ſon and heir, whoſe wife was Joan de Kilrington, by whom he had Sir Bartholomew de Chercile, who held the Caſtle of Briſtol for King Stephen; in whoſe ſervice he was killed, and in honour of him, the ſmall town of Churchill, was ſo called (3). He married Agnes, daughter to Ralph Fitz Ralph, Lord of Tiverton, and by her had Pagan de Chercile, whoſe ſon Roger had free warren in his lands in Chercile in the reign of Edward I. To this Roger ſucceeded Elias de Churchelle, whoſe wife was Dorothy, a daughter of the ancient family of Columbiers, and by her had three ſons, John, who married Joan, daughter and coheir to Roger Dawney of Norton, and left only two daughters his coheirs, Margaret, the wife of Andrew Hilberſon of the county of Devon, and Agnes, married to Thomas Gifford of Theuborough in Cornwall, whereby the Lordſhip of Churchill and other lands devolved on them. Giles, ſecond ſon, had the Lordſhip of Yampton and Lineham in Devonſhire, which eſtates, by a female heir, deſcended to the family of Croker of the ſame county, ſo that William, the third ſon of Elias, was the chief heir-male (4). This William was ſeated at Rockbear in the county of Devon, and left iſſue, Giles Churchill, Eſq; father of Charles Churchill, Eſq; who, for his firm adherence to the Houſe of York, was in great favour with King Edward IV. who advanced him to the marriage of Margaret, only daughter of Sir William Wodvile, by whom he had Thomas Churchill, Eſq; whoſe wife was Grace, daughter and coheir to Thomas Tylle of Tylle-houſe in the county of Cornwall, and by her he had William Churchill, his heir and ſucceſſor, who married Mary, eldeſt daughter to Richard Creuſe of Wicroft-caſtle in the county of Devon, Eſq; and by her he had three ſons, Roger of Catherſton, William of Corton, and John, who was ſeated at Muſton, all in the county of Dorſet. The ſaid Roger marrying Jane, relict of Nicholas Mogg, and daughter to William Peverell of Bradford, by her had Matthew Churchill of Bradford, who marrying Elizabeth, daughter to John Chaplet of Herringſton in the county of Dorſet, had John, his heir, grandfather of Sir Winſton, and another ſon, named Jaſper, father of Sir John Churchill, an eminent Counſel in the reign of King Charles II. who marrying Suſan, daughter to Edmund Prideaux, Eſq; by her, left only four daughters, who were his coheirs (5).

(5) Remarks on the Genealogy of the Family of Churchill.

[B] To ſome of the beſt and nobleſt families in this kingdom.] The family of the Drakes of Aſhe in the county of Devon, were very ancient and honourable, and were firſt ſeated at Exmouth in the ſame county, where there had been no leſs than ten ſucceſſions, all of the name of John (6). Sir Bernard Drake, grandfather of Sir Winſton Churchill, by his mother's ſide, was a great Courtier, and a famous ſea Captain in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and was a perſon of ſo high ſpirit, that he gave the famous Sir Francis Drake a box on the ear for aſſuming his Arms, which were a Wivern diſplayed, Gules; and this provoked the Queen to ſuch a degree, that ſhe gave a new Coat to Sir Francis Drake, and for his creſt, a ſhip on a Globe held by a cable with a hand out of the clouds, and in the rigging hung up by the heels a Wivern with wings diſplayed, Gules; of which, when ſhe aſked Sir Bernard his opinion, he boldly anſwered, Madam, though you could give him a finer, yet you could not give him an ancienter Coat than mine (7) This gentleman, who deceaſed Anno Dom. 1585, by Gertrude his wife, daughter of Bartholomew Forteſcue of Fillegh in the ſame county, anceſtor to the late Earl of Clinton (8), had iſſue, Sir John Drake, Knt. who married Eleanor, ſecond daughter, and one of the coheireſſes of John, Lord Boteler of Brampfield (9) in the county of Hertford, a perſon of very illuſtrious deſcent, and who eſpouſed Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir George Villiers of Brokeſby in the county of Leiceſter, Knt. ſiſter to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of the Kings, James and Charles I (10). The ſon of this gentleman, and the brother of Lady Churchill was Knighted by King Charles II. and afterwards created a Baronet by the ſame Prince, Auguſt 31, 1660 (11): he was alſo intended among the reſt of the loyal Gentlemen of Devonſhire to have been made a Knight of the Royal Oak, if the King, for very good reaſons, had not thought fit to deſiſt from that deſign; but his name ſtill remains in the liſt of thoſe who were propoſed for that honour, from whence it appears, that he was then eſteemed to have an eſtate of eight hundred pounds a year (12). This family is now extinct, but in honour of his deſcent from it, his Grace, the late Duke of Marlborough, took for his ſupporters, two Wiverns, Gules (13); and the preſent Duke has for his ſiniſter ſupporter, a Wivern, Argent, wings expanded (14).

affairs wore another aſpect: he removed to his ſeat at Minthorn in Dorſetſhire, and was elected a Burgeſs for the borough of Weymouth in that county, for that Parliament which met May 8, 1661 (i); and ſoon after, viz. in the latter end of 1663, his Majeſty was pleaſed to confer upon him the honour of Knighthood (k). The ſecurity and quiet of the times reviving in his breaſt that love of literature which had poſſeſſed him in his youth, he aſſociated himſelf much with men of learning, and with ſuch as were remarkable for being the patrons of learning, which induced the Members of the Royal Society, ſoon after its foundation, to elect him a Fellow of that noble eſtabliſhment for the promoting of uſeful knowledge (l). In the year 1664, Sir Winſton Churchill, together with Sir Richard Rainsford, Sir Thomas Beverly, Sir Edward Deering, Sir Edward Smith, Sir Allen Broderick, and Colonel Cook, were appointed Commiſſioners of the Court of Claims in Ireland (m), with power to hear and adjudge the qualifications of thoſe who had forfeited their eſtates; in which office he did very great ſervice, by contributing, in conjunction with his colleagues, to ſettle that nation in a ſtate of tranquillity, which, at the time of their coming over, was in very great diſtraction (n) [C]. Upon his return from thence, he was conſtituted one of the Clerks Comptrollers of the Green Cloth, an office of conſideration and credit at court, and received alſo other marks of his Majeſty's kind acceptance of his ſervices. But, as his attendance at court did not take up any great portion of his time, he had leiſure enough to reſume his ſtudies, and this led him to review and publiſh a kind of Political Eſſay upon the Hiſtory of England, in which having treated many points, and more eſpecially one, according to thoſe high notions of loyalty which he had imbibed in his youth, and upon which he always acted (o), they drew a cenſure upon his book by men of different principles, who likewiſe attacked his conduct in Parliament with great virulence. It is perhaps owing to the notions then conceived to its prejudice, that, notwithſtanding the reading and learning ſhewn therein, very little regard is now paid to his work [D]. The [C] Was in very great diſtraction.] The deſign of this Court, which was erected in virtue of the Act of Settlement, was to diſtinguiſh, among the old Iriſh, between the innocent and the guilty. The period aſſigned by the King's Declaration, was the 2d of May 1661, which the Iriſh Parliament enlarged to the 1ſt of Auguſt 1662, and prolonged it afterwards to July 2, 1663. The place in which they ſat was at the King's Inn in Dublin, and out of about four thouſand Claims, they determined before their commiſſion expired, about ſix hundred and thirty, by which, numbers of perſons and their heirs were reſtored, who would otherwiſe have loſt their eſtates (15). This certainly contributed not a little to calm the minds of the native Iriſh; but at the ſame time it occaſioned a very high clamour amongſt Cromwell's ſoldiers, and all thoſe to whom theſe lands had been diſpoſed of, by the powers that were then lately in being; and to this, we are to impute that reſentment with which ſome writers ſpeak of this Court of Claims, and of thoſe who ſat therein (16).

[D] Very little regard is now paid to his work.] The title of this book at large, runs thus: DIVI BRITANNICI, being a Remark upon the Lives of all the Kings of this Iſle, from the year of the world 2855, unto the year of Grace 1660, by Sir Winſton Churchill, Knt. London 1675, fol. It is dedicated to King Charles II. and in the Dedication, the author takes notice, that having ſerved his Majeſty's father as long as he could with his ſword, he ſpent a great part of thoſe leiſure hours, which were forced upon him by his misfortunes, in defending that Prince's cauſe, and, indeed, the cauſe of Monarchy itſelf, with his pen; and he very clearly avows, that he looked upon his work as the funeral Oration of that deceaſed government, or rather as his title ſpeaks it, the Apotheoſes of departed Kings. This being the nature of his work, it was natural to expect, that the ſtile ſhould correſpond therewith, that it ſhould be raiſed and florid, and not ſubjected to the rules of Hiſtory, for which the author never meant it. But notwithſtanding this, the dates are generally very exact, the facts are well ſupported by authorities, there are abundance of curious and judicious obſervations interſperſed through it, and if it were not for that flaming zeal, that Enthuſiaſm of Loyalty which runs through it, and which, if it was a weakneſs in the author, was alſo the foible of thoſe times, and the more excuſable in a perſon who had fought and ſuffered for his principles, it might be conſidered as a very extraordinary performance. In order to juſtify in ſome meaſure this account, it may not be amiſs to cite a very curious paſſage from his Introduction. Thus it runs; 'What the number 'and ſtrength of the Norman was, may be nearly 'computed by what he did abroad in that holy, and 'what he ſuffered at home in that unholy war, commonly called the Barons War: the firſt, for religion; 'the laſt, for liberty. The one having conſumed as 'many lives as there were ſtones in the walls of the 'Holy City they fought for; the other not ſo fatal, 'becauſe poiſed with a more equal force, but altogether as formidable; there being at leaſt 50,000 'always ready to do execution on either ſide. So 'ſtood the caſe for the firſt two hundred and fifty 'years after the entrance of William the Firſt. The 'computation of the middle times, muſt be taken 'from the preparation of Edward the Third, when 'he took two Kings, and miſſed but little of taking 'two kingdoms at once, engaging himſelf in a double edged war, that ended not with his own 'life or theirs; wherein, though it is ſuppoſed he 'exhauſted as much of the force as the treaſure of 'the kingdom, yet he did not ſo weaken his ſucceſſor 'Richard II. but that he was able to take the field 'with 300,000 foot, and 100,000 horſe attending 'him (as Walſingham tells us) whoſe teſtimony has 'the more credit, by how much it is ſeconded by 'Emilius, the French Hiſtorian, who had no cauſe 'to magnify the number of the Engliſh at that time. 'Later computations may be taken from the preparations of Henry the Eighth, at Bullen, Queen 'Elizabeth, at Tilbury, at either, not ſo little, as '185,000 foot, and 40,000 horſe in readineſs for 'preſent ſervice; for I am willing to paſs by the conſideration of thoſe vaſt numbers which ſupported 'that unnatural quarrel betwixt the two fatal Houſes 'of York and Lancaſter, as likewiſe the late war betwixt King Charles the Firſt and the Republican 'Faction, when it is believed there were no leſs than 'three hundred thouſand foot, and ſixty thouſand 'horſe actually engaged in arms; and from thoſe 'parades at the reception of King James, when he 'made his firſt entry into England, and more eſpecially at the happy Reſtauration of our Sovereign, 'that now is, whoſe Life-guard at his landing, were 'no leſs than fifty thouſand of perhaps the beſt horſe 'in the world: not reckoning thoſe appointed for the 'defence of the Realm. However, all the computations of our land forces fall ſo ſhort of our Maritime, that, as there is no compariſon to be made 'betwixt

The diſlike of the party did not ſtop here, but followed him ſo cloſely, that after the diſſolution of that which was ſtiled the Long Parliament, he was, in 1678, diſmiſſed from his poſt of Clerk of the Green Cloth (p), though much againſt his Maſter's will, who, as ſoon as he delivered himſelf from the reſtraint which the ſituation of his affairs had put him under, reſtored him again to his office, which, during the reſt of that reign, he held, and was the oldeſt Clerk of the Green Cloth at King Charles's death (q). He remained in his office, and enjoyed the ſame if not a greater degree of favour from court, during the ſhort reign of King James II. and having had the pleaſure to ſee his eldeſt ſurviving ſon raiſed to the Peerage, and the reſt of his children in a fair way of promotion, he departed this life the twenty-ſixth of March, 1688 (r); and three days after was buried in the pariſh church of St. Martin in the Fields, leaving iſſue by his Lady before-mentioned ſeveral children, both ſons and daughters, as the reader may ſee in the notes [E]; beſides three ſons and as many daughters that died in their infancy, and of whom therefore it was not neceſſary to give any farther account.

' betwixt them; ſo we may ſay, that we have rendred ' ourſelves more formidable by our Cannon Law at ' ſea, than any other people by any Law of Arms ' whatſoever.' We are told by Anthony Wood (17), that there being ſome paſſages in this work about the King's power of raiſing money without Parliament; this gave ſuch offence to the Members of the Parliament then ſitting, that the leaf in which this occurred being cancelled, and reprinted without that offenſive paſſage in a great part of the edition, the author hoped thereby to pleaſe and to give content. If Mr. Wood had been pleaſed to inform us, which page this was, it would have ſhewn more accuracy and better acquaintance with a work that he has cenſured very ſeverely. In the ſaid book, ſays he, which is very thin and trite, are the Arms of all the Kings of England, which made it ſell among Novices, rather than from the matter therein. Another critical Hiſtorian, who ſeems to have had Mr. Wood in his eye, ſpeaks alſo very ſlightly of our author's performance (18). ' There are, ſays he, ſome later Hiſtories, which are ' ſo well known to all that are any thing curious in ' theſe matters, that I need do little more than ' mention them; ſuch are Sir Winſtone Churchill's ' Divi Britainnici, which gives the reader a diverting ' view of the Arms and exploits of our Kings down ' to the Reſtoration in 1660, &c.' Another writer treats our author's character as well as book with leſs decency; for he charges him (19) not only with aſſerting that the King might raiſe money without a Parliament, but with conſenting to his daughter's kindneſs for the Duke of York, and receiving in gratifications from the Crown ten thouſand pounds. But conſidering this as a political pamphlet written to ſerve a particular turn, and written at a time when the preſs being under reſtraint, that which was intended for the cure, proved really the cauſe of libels, we are not bound to receive all the author of it ſays for Goſpel.

[E] As the reader may ſee in the notes.] The eldeſt of his ſons that lived to man's eſtate, was John, afterwards Duke of Marlborough, &c. of whom in the next article. The next, George Churchill, of whom we ſhall alſo ſpeak hereafter. Charles Churchill, the Duke's ſecond brother was born at Aſhe the 2d of February 1656. He was likewiſe bred to arms, and was noted for ſeveral brave actions. At thirteen years of age, he was made Page of Honour to Chriſtian King of Denmark; and at ſixteen, Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber to his brother Prince George. At the Revolution, he ſucceeded Major-General Oglethorpe in his regiment of foot; and in 1692, at the battle of Steenkirk, Auguſt 23, he was Brigadier-General. The Brigade under his command behaved bravely, as they did, likewiſe the year following, at the battle of Landen, where he himſelf gave the greateſt proofs of his courage and conduct in the defence of the villages of Lare and Neder Winden, and where he took his nephew the Duke of Berwick priſoner. He was made Major-General of Foot, and Governor of Kinſale in Ireland, by King William, and after many battles fought with great bravery and conduct was eſteemed one of the beſt Commanders of Foot in Europe. By his gracious Miſtreſs, Queen Anne, he was made Governor of the Tower of London, General of the army, and General in Chief of Foot, and had a great and honourable ſhare in the ever memorable battle of Blenheim: after which, for his many and great ſervices, he was made Governor of Bruſſels, Colonel of the Coldſtream regiment of Foot-guards, and Governor of her Majeſty's iſland of Guernſey. In the year 1702, he married Mary, daughter and ſole heireſs of James Goulde of Dorcheſter, Eſq; by whom he had no iſſue. He died much lamented, December 29, 1714; and his widow about three years after his deceaſe, married the Right Honourable the Earl of Abington. Theobald Churchill, Sir Winſton's youngeſt ſon, had his academical education in Queen's College in Oxford, where he commenced Maſter of Arts, June 13, 1683; and entering into Holy Orders, died unmarried, December 3, 1685, and was buried in the pariſh-church of St. Martin in the Fields in Weſtminſter. Arabella Churchill, the eldeſt of Sir Winſton's children, was born in March 1648, was Maid of Honour to the Ducheſs of York, and beloved by the Duke, afterwards King James II. by whom ſhe had two ſons and two daughters. The eldeſt, James Fitz-James, was created by his father, Duke of Berwick; he was alſo Knight of the Garter and of the Golden-Fleece, Marſhal of France, and Grandee of Spain of the firſt claſs. He was juſtly reputed one of the greateſt officers of his time, and being Generaliſſimo of the armies of France, fell by a cannon-ſhot at the ſiege of Philipſburgh in 1734. Henry Fitz-James, Grand Prior of France, Lieutenant-General and Admiral of the French gallies, was born in 1673, and died in 1702. Henrietta, born in 1670, married Sir Henry Waldgrave of Cheuton, grandfather to the preſent Earl of Waldgrave, and died in 1730: the younger daughter was a Nun. This Lady afterwards married Colonel Godfrey, by whom ſhe had two daughters; the eldeſt, Charlotte, married the late Lord Viſcount Falmouth; and the younger, Elizabeth, eſpouſed Edmund Dunch, Eſq; C.

 [Dr. Campbell hath carried his candour to the utmoſt exceſs, in calling Sir Winſton Churchill an eminent Hiſtorian; for certainly he has no juſt pretenſions to that character. His book is now almoſt totally unknown: it never was much read; and it never had any degree of reputation, excepting for the amuſement which its cuts might afford. It is plain from the learned Biographer's own account of it, and from the extract he has given, though intended in its favour, that the work is of little value in point of compoſition, and that its principles are hoſtile to liberty. It was honour enough to Sir Winſton Churchill, that he was father to the illuſtrious Duke of Marlborough. It was leſs to the honour of his family, that his daughter was mother to the Duke of Berwick, though he, alſo, was a great man. An account of the laſt Duke has lately been publiſhed; but, notwithſtanding his having been born in England, his hiſtory belongs to that of another country.] K.

CHURCHILL (JOHN), Duke of Marlborough, and Prince of the Holy Roman Empire, one of the ableſt Stateſmen and moſt polite Courtiers, as well as one of the greateſt Captains and moſt illuſtrious Heroes, that our nation, or indeed any other, has produced. He was born at Aſhe, the ſeat of his grandfather by the mother's ſide, in Devonſhire, on Midſummer day 1650, a little before noon, and two days after was baptized by Mr. Matthew Drake, Rector of that pariſh (a). We have already ſhewn that his father's circumſtances were far from being eaſy, either at this time, or for ſeveral years afterwards; and, therefore, we need not at all wonder, that his ſon had not thoſe advantages in his education which were due to his birth (b). Yet there is reaſon to believe, that a learned father would not, in any degree, neglect the care of a ſon, who was the firſt hopes of his family; for though he had an elder brother, Winſton Churchill, yet he ſoon died, and therefore John, while a child, was conſidered as the heir, and treated accordingly. A worthy Clergyman in the neighbourhood inſtructed him in the firſt principles of literature, under the eye of his father, and from them both he received ſuch a tincture of true religion and zeal for the church of England, as continued to manifeſt itſelf throughout his whole life; and though no man was leſs a bigot, yet never any perſon of his rank ſhewed either greater reſpect for, or firmer belief in, the Chriſtian faith, than he (c). His father carried him very early to court, where the beauty of his perſon, the pregnancy of his parts, and the modeſty of his behaviour, recommended him, when but twelve years of age, to the peculiar notice of James Duke of York, to whom he ſoon afterwards became a Page, and at the ſame time a favourite (d). It is generally agreed, that he had a pair of colours given him in the Guards during the firſt Dutch war, that is, about the year 1666, but the manner in which he obtained them is ſomewhat differently reported [A]. That war ending ſoon after, and Mr. Churchill being impatient to gain ſome practical knowledge in the trade of arms, which he now conſidered as his profeſſion, he obtained leave to go over to Tangier, then in our hands, and beſieged by the Moors (e), where he reſided for ſome ſhort time, and where he had the firſt opportunity of ſhewing his courage, and of acquiring experience, which never any did in leſs time than he; for, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to obſerve, his very firſt actions were in their nature as great as any in his whole life; and the firſt time he was honoured with a command in chief, he appeared as much a General as in the laſt of his moſt glorious actions. Upon his return to England, he continued his attendance at court, and received, as well from the King as from the Duke, daily marks of kindneſs and favour, notwithſtanding the ſlanderous tales that flew about the court as to his amorous adventures (f). In 1672, the Duke of Monmouth commanding a body of Engliſh auxiliaries in the ſervice of France, Mr. Churchill, who was always for ſeeing action, attended him, and was very ſoon after made Captain of Grenadiers in his Grace's own regiment. He had a ſhare in all the actions that were performed in that famous campaign, which brought the Republick of Holland lower in a few months, than the Spaniards were able to bring her in many years. At the ſiege of Nimeguen, Captain Churchill diſtinguiſhed himſelf particularly, inſomuch that he was taken notice of by the celebrated Marſhal Turenne, who beſtowed on him the name of the handſome Engliſhman, by which he was generally known while he continued in the French army; more eſpecially after a very gallant action he performed, in recovering a poſt of importance from the Dutch, with half the number of men that had been under a French Lieutenant-Colonel, who was entruſted with the defence of it, and who quitted it upon the enemy's approach (g). But the moſt ſoldier-like action of this war was the reduction of the ſtrong fortreſs of Maeſtricht, which had in it a garriſon of ten thouſand men at that time, and thoſe, too, well provided and well commanded. In the night of the fourteenth of June, the Duke of Monmouth, being Lieu-

[A] Is ſomewhat differently reported.] It is ſaid by ſome, that Sir Winſton Churchill perceiving his ſon's inclination to Arms, and being deſirous to gratify it, applied to the Duke of York, and by his intereſt with that Prince, procured him an Enſign's commiſſion (1). Another account is given, which is the more probable, and which I have heard confirmed by perſons that had a relation to the Duke of Marlborough's family. He was firſt Page to the Duke, and in that quality attended his Royal Highneſs frequently when the Guards were exerciſed and muſtered before him, to which the youth being extremely attentive, and upon being aſked ſome queſtions relating to their exerciſe, anſwering with an unexpected degree of penetration and ſagacity, the Duke, who, in the judgment of Marſhal Turenne, had a very good military genius, and was to the laſt degree fond of troops, ſhewed himſelf highly pleaſed, as well with his capacity as his inclination; and thereupon, to encourage and enter him in the world, gave him the next pair of Colours that fell (2). Thoſe who are fond of ſecret Hiſtory and marvellous adventures, have reported, that the Duke gave him this commiſſion, that he might have an opportunity of ſending him to Tangier out of the way of the Ducheſs of York, who was thought to look upon him with an air of tenderneſs, that made his Royal Highneſs not a little uneaſy (3). But whoever conſiders, not only the great difference of rank, but the vaſt diſproportion in age between them, for Mr. Churchill could not be above fifteen, when this is ſuppoſed to have happened, the ſeveral eaſy and natural motives excluſively of the young Gentleman's merit, that might induce the Duke to have a more than ordinary affection for him, and the conſtancy of that Prince's favour towards him through all the different changes of both their circumſtances, will ſee no cauſe whatever to recur to any ſuch ſlight anecdotes as theſe, which tarniſh ſo many reputations, and, at the ſame time, are not ſo much as reported by any who could be ſuppoſed to have a juſt knowledge of the truth of them, if, which is very improbable, they had been really facts.

tenant-General of the trenches, attacked, and made himself master of a half-moon; but the Dutch before day sprang a mine to the right with so good effect, that the French troops, though the best in the whole army, were beaten out of those posts; nor could the forces ordered for that service recover them, till the Duke of Monmouth, with ten or twelve English volunteers, threw himself into the hottest fire, and thereby inspired the forces with such ardour that they again drove out the Dutch, and became a second time masters of all the posts which they had attacked the day before (b). The share Captain Churchill had in this business was so very remarkable, that the French King thanked him for it at the head of the line, and assured him that he would acquaint his Sovereign with the particulars of his gallant behaviour, which he did; and his Grace the Duke of Monmouth, on their return to England, in relating what happened at the attack, told the King his father, that he was indebted to Captain Churchill for much of his glory, and for his safety altogether, since by his bravery he had preserved his life (i). This good fortune which began in the twenty-second year of our hero's life, attended all his succeeding undertakings, so that his sword was never drawn but victory pursued. The laurels he brought from France very justly entitled him to preferment at home, and his Majesty having made him Lieutenant-Colonel of Littleton's regiment, the Duke made him Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, and soon after Master of the Robes (k). The second Dutch war being over, Colonel Churchill found himself again obliged to pass his days at Court, where he was no less distinguished as a fine gentleman, than he had been admired for his military qualities in the camp [B]. He behaved with great prudence and circumspection in those troublesome times that ensued, and gave frequent demonstrations of his inflexible attachment to the Protestant Religion, as well as of an inviolable fidelity to his most gracious Master. In the beginning of the year 1679, when the King's pleasure was signified to the Duke of York, that he should pass some time in the Low-Countries, Colonel Churchill attended his Royal Highness and his family, first to the Hague and then to Brussels, waited upon him in his short trip to England, and in his journey to Windsor, and returned with him upon the King's recovering from that illness, which brought over the Duke a second time to Brussels (l). He likewise accompanied him the next year in travelling by land into Scotland, where the King his brother gave him not only leave to reside, but in some measure put the management of that kingdom into his hands, which has not been numbered amongst the wisest actions of that Monarch's reign. His Royal Highness arrived at Edinburgh on the fourth of December 1680, whither Colonel Churchill attended him; and being then considered as a favourite, he was very respectfully treated, and generally applied to by the Nobility of Scotland (m). He returned with his Master to London, and went down with him a second time by sea, when he had the misfortune to be obliged to retire thither again, upon the heats raised against him in the House of Commons. While he waited upon the Duke, he had a regiment of dragoons given him, and thinking it now time to settle himself in the world, he made his addresses to Mrs. Sarah Jennings, who then [B] For his military qualities in the camp.] It may be reasonably looked upon as a thing not a little strange, that, considering the great figure the Duke of Marlborough made for so many years, there should be so few materials preserved of the earlier part of his life; and that those we have, are much fitter to adorn Novels, than to enrich Histories. It is for this reason, that all one can say upon this subject, must be borrowed from tradition, and from the reports of those, who were well acquainted with this great man in the dawn of his life. On this, which is the best authority that can be had, I may venture to acquaint the reader, that very few people of his rank, were either so much or so generally esteemed, as Colonel Churchill; and I dare assure him, that at a time when the Court of England was considered in all respects, as the most splendid and the most polite in Europe, that of France only excepted, Colonel Churchill was distinguished by the general reputation of being one of the best natured and best bred men in it. It is very certain, that his amours are much talked of; and in so gallant a Court, as that of King Charles II. a very young, a very handsome, and a very rising man, might be excused, if he fell into some errors of this kind. But it is on all hands allowed, that even at this time, his prudence had so much the better of his passions, that he never suffered himself to be carried away by any of them, to such a degree, as to be in any respect wanting, either to his duty or his interests; which, whoever is well acquainted with human nature, will look upon to be a very extraordinary thing at his time of life; since experience, as well as reason, will inform us, that though commanding armies and gaining victories are great things, yet in respect to the powers of the human mind, it is a still greater, with faculties capable of commanding and conquering, to be able to controul desires, and to keep every appetite in due subjection. This he did in a very great degree; and yet in his youth, he was thought for a Courtier somewhat too free a speaker. He had wit, and indeed a great deal of wit; but his supreme excellency was his penetration, for which he was highly distinguished long before the great rise of his fortunes; for by the natural strength of his judgment, he would pronounce so clearly, both of men and things, that his remarks were frequently talked of; and as they were almost always justified by the event, he was admired as one of the shrewdest men of those times; but, together with this admiration, there went no small mixture of envy. He was so sensible of the inconveniencies that might arise from the liberty that was natural to him in discourse, that he declined, as much as he could, all political subjects, and never had any notion of becoming a Member of the House of Commons, but contented himself with pushing his fortune in his own way; or, as the gamesters say, he would bowl only upon the ground that he perfectly understood. In short, his affability gained him a general good report, for which he had a just esteem. His application to the profession of arms, secured to him the character he truly deserved, of being, in its most extensive sense, a good officer; and his steady zeal for the person and cause of the Duke, which at that juncture was very conspicuous, procured him that interest and influence, which no man in the world knew better how to direct or to apply.

waited on the Lady Anne, afterwards Queen of Great-Britain. This young Lady, who was then about twenty-one, and juſtly eſteemed both for her perſon and her parts one of the fineſt women in this iſland, he married in 1681, and thereby added very conſiderably to the intereſt he had already had at Court (n). In the ſpring of the year 1682 the Duke of York returned to London, and having procured his Majeſty's leave to quit that kingdom, and to reſide as formerly at Court, he reſolved to return to Scotland by ſea to bring up his family, and for that purpoſe embarked on board the Glouceſter frigate, commanded by Sir John Berry, May 4, 1682, but unluckily ran upon the Lemon-oar, a dangerous ſand that lies about ſixteen leagues from the mouth of the Humber, where his ſhip was loſt with ſome perſons of quality, and upwards of one hundred and twenty perſons on board her (o). This melancholy accident afforded his Royal Highneſs an opportunity of ſhewing the tender affection that he had for Colonel Churchill, of whoſe ſafety he was particularly careful, by taking him with him in the boat in which himſelf eſcaped the danger. The circumſtances of this ſhipwreck are very differently reported; but with regard to the Duke's concern for Colonel Churchill all writers are agreed, though hardly in any other point [C]. The ſtay of his Royal Highneſs in that kingdom was but very ſhort; for as he ſailed from England in the beginning, ſo he arrived with his family in the river of Thames from Scotland, before the end of the month of May 1682, and was received with the utmoſt marks of brotherly affection by the King. The firſt uſe made by his Royal Highneſs of this ſun-ſhine of favour, was to obtain a title for his favourite, Colonel Churchill, who, by Letters Patents bearing date December 1, 1682, was created Baron of Eymouth in the kingdom of Scotland (p), and was alſo appointed Colonel of the third troop of Guards. Theſe were the laſt favours he received from that King, and no doubt his Lordſhip would have much more regretted the loſs of ſo kind and good a Prince, had he not been ſucceeded by the Duke of York, to whom the Lord Churchill was ſtill dear. This appeared plainly upon the firſt acceſſion of King James, who not only continued him in his poſt in the Bed-chamber, and in his command in the Guards, but ſent him alſo his Ambaſſador to France to notify his acceſſion, which high office he diſcharged with much advantage to his reputation (q) [D]. [C] Though hardly in any other point.] This buſineſs of the Duke's ſhipwreck in going to Scotland has exerciſed many pens, and has been tranſmitted to poſterity in very different lights; but with reſpect to the ſaving Colonel Churchill, it is agreed, that when the ſhip was loſt, the Duke was aſleep; and that upon his being awaked, and finding nothing to truſt to but the long-boat, he named ſome particular perſons who ſhould go into her with him, and amongſt others Colonel Churchill (4); though a certain author turns the tables, and ſays, the Colonel was very inſtrumental in ſaving his Royal Highneſs's life (5), which very poſſibly might, and if there was any room for it, muſt be true. A certain reverend Prelate (6) gives us the following account of it, which, conſidering the reſpect paid to his authority, deſerves, if poſſible, to be explained and corrected. 'The Duke 'had leave given him to come to the King at New-'market: and there he prevailed for leave to come 'up and live again at court. As he was going back 'to bring the Ducheſs, the Glouceſter frigate that 'carried him ſtruck on a bank of ſand. The Duke 'got into a boat: and took care of his dogs, and 'ſome unknown perſons, who were taken from that 'earneſt care of his to be his Prieſts. The long-'boat went off with very few in her, though ſhe 'might have carried off above eighty more 'than ſhe did. One hundred and fifty perſons pe-'riſhed: ſome of them, men of great quality. But 'the Duke took no notice of this cruel neglect, which 'was laid chiefly to Legge's charge.' Another writer, who penned his accounts of things at this time, and without any view of publiſhing them, tells this ſtory thus (7): 'May the 10, 1682, this day 'came news, that his Highneſs had been in great 'danger of being caſt away in his voyage back to the 'North, the ſhip he was in having ſtruck upon Yar-'mouth Sands, and that a great number of the paſ-'ſengers had been loſt; a piece of news, that was at 'firſt contradicted, but in a day or two confirmed by 'a particular account, that the Glouceſter, a third 'rate, in which the Duke of York had embarked 'for Scotland, had actually ſuffered ſhipwreck upon 'one of Yarmouth Sands, called the Lemon-Oar; 'and that the Duke with about an hundred and 'ſixty perſons were ſaved: among thoſe that periſhed 'were the Lords O'Brian and Roxborough, and Mr. 'Hyde, Lord Clarendon's brother.' This account agrees very well with that given us by another writer, of there being above three hundred perſons aboard the ſhip, of which the major part were ſaved, and amongſt thoſe who were drowned was the Duke's brother-in-law, Mr. Hyde, which did not argue any great reſpect of perſons in thoſe who were ſuffered to go into the long-boat (8). What blame fell upon Legge, or who this Legge was, is not eaſy to determine; for as to Colonel Legge, then Maſter of the Ordnance, and a Privy-Counſellor, afterwards Lord Dartmouth, and Admiral of the fleet, he was viſiting the fortreſſes of the kingdom, at this time, by his Majeſty's command (9). What there was of ſeverity in the caſe, ſeems to have been no more than this; that two perſons, one in the boat, the other on board the ſhip, ſtood with their ſwords drawn, to prevent that irregular crowding, which might have endangered the boat as well as the ſhip; and if the reader is curious to know who thoſe perſons were, we ſhall endeavour to ſatisfy him. He on board the ſhip was Sir John Berry, who after performing this ſervice, eſcaped very narrowly himſelf, by ſwimming to a rope that was thrown over the ſtern of Capt. Wybourn's ſhip (10); and he in the boat was Colonel Churchill (11), who for this ſervice is very juſtly ſaid to have contributed to the preſervation of the Duke his maſter's life.

[D] Which high office he diſcharged with much advantage to his reputation.] We have an account of this matter from a reverend Prelate, who ſeems to be better acquainted with it than any writer of thoſe times, and therefore upon his authority we muſt in this caſe wholly rely. His words upon the ſubject are theſe (12). 'In one thing only the King ſeemed 'to comply with the genius of the nation, though it 'proved in the end to be only a ſhew. He ſeemed 'reſolved not to be governed by French counſels, but 'to act on an equality with that haughty Monarch in 'all things. And as he entertained all the other fo-'reign Miniſters with aſſurances, that he would 'maintain the balance of Europe with a more ſteady 'hand than had been done formerly, ſo when he 'ſent over the Lord Churchill to the court of France, 'with the notice of his brother's death, he ordered 'him

On his Lordſhip's return from France he was conſtituted High-Steward of the borough of St. Alban's, on the ſixteenth of March 1685, an honour ſeldom conferred but upon perſons of the higheſt quality (r). He aſſiſted at the coronation of King James on the twenty-third of April following, and on the fourteenth of May the ſame year he was created a Peer of England, by the title of Baron Churchill of Sandridge in the county of Hertford, a manor that belonged to him in right of his wife, into whoſe family it came a little before by marriage (s) In the month of June, his Lordſhip being then Lieutenant-General of the King's forces, was ordered into the Weſt, upon the Duke of Monmouth's making a bold but very inconſiderate attempt, in which, amongſt many other errors, his greateſt was that of aſſuming the lofty title of King, and ſetting a price upon his uncle's head, which afterwards became fatal to his own (t). His forces were, from the beginning, harraſſed by a very inconſiderable body of horſe commanded by Lord Churchill, which was one great reaſon that compelled him to venture all upon a battle; and knowing that his irregular troops would be very unequally matched, though ſomewhat ſuperior in number to the King's forces, he laboured to remedy that inconvenience by attacking in the dark (u), which might probably have been attended with ſucceſs, if Lord Churchill, who was more vigilant than other officers, had not ſat up all night, and with part of Dunbarton's regiment kept the rebels in play till the infantry was formed, and then charging the Duke's horſe that were commanded by Lord Gray, they were either broken or betrayed into immediate flight, which decided the fortune of the day and that early; for the battle of Sedgmore was over between four and five o'clock in the morning, on the ſixth of July 1685 (w). This was a deciſive ſtroke, and would have been ſo which ever ſide prevailed, for a great part of the nation, from the fear of Popery, were inclined to the Duke; but his army being defeated, and himſelf taken, the danger of the rebellion was entirely over. It is reaſonable to ſuppoſe that Lord Churchill was extreamly well received by the King upon his return; but it was not long before his Lordſhip diſcerned that this victory had bad as well as good effects, that it confirmed the King in his opinion of his ſtanding forces, and miſ-led him into a belief, that at the head of an Engliſh army he might trample upon Engliſh liberty; but he ſoon found his miſtake (x). Whatever ſhare his Lordſhip had in the Royal favour, and whatever advantage accrued to him from his poſts and preferments, it is a truth notorious, that he was never guilty of any mean compliance, nor had any concern in ſuggeſting, or in executing any of the violent counſels in that unhappy reign. Thoſe came from other men, and men of other principles, or rather of no principles at all, who hurried their maſter to his ruin, while Lord Churchill very prudently declined meddling much in buſineſs, ſpoke little excepting when his advice was aſked, and then always recommended moderate meaſures (y). It is ſaid that he declared very early to Lord Galway, that if his maſter attempted to overturn the eſtabliſhed religion he would leave him; and this is the more probable, becauſe during that whole reign, and indeed during his whole life, he never diſſembled his zeal for the Church of England, on what ſide ſoever that Church was attacked. It is alſo ſaid that he ſigned the Memorial tranſmitted to the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, by which they were invited to reſcue this nation from Popery and ſlavery (z); but be that as it will, it is very certain that he remained with, and was entruſted by, the King, after the Prince of Orange was landed, November 5, 1688. He attended King James when he marched with his forces to oppoſe, and even to fight, the Prince, and had the command of a brigade of five thouſand men; yet the Earl of Feverſham ſuſpecting his inclinations, adviſed the King to ſeize him; but his Majeſty's affection to him was ſo great, that he rejected that motion, which gave his Lordſhip an opportunity of executing his deſign of retiring to the Prince; but he betrayed no poſt, carried off no troops, but with the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkeley, and four or five officers, withdrew from the King's quarters, and joined the Prince of Orange at Axminſter, which is about twenty miles from Exeter, leaving a letter for the King, expreſſing the reaſons of his conduct, and the grief of mind he was under from the part that he was

'him to obſerve exactly the ceremony and ſtate with 'which he was received, that he might treat him 'who ſhould be ſent over, with the compliment in 'return to that in the ſame manner. And this he 'obſerved very punctually, when the Marſhal de 'Lorge came over. This was ſet about by the courtiers, as a ſign of another ſpirit, that might be 'looked for in a reign ſo begun. And this made 'ſome impreſſion on the court of France, and put 'them to a ſtand. But not long after this the French 'King ſaid to the Duke of Villeroy, who told it to 'young Rouvigny, now Earl of Galway, (from 'whom I had it) that the King of England, after all 'the high things given out in his name, was willing 'to take his money, as well as his brother had done.'

It may not be amiſs to annex here, another piece of ſecret hiſtory from a writer, who was very well acquainted with theſe times, and yet he will be a bold man that ſhould deſire implicit credit to be given to either author (13): 'At this time,' ſays my author, 'the favourites at court began to be at ſtrife with 'each other: the Lord Sunderland was made Preſident of the Council, and continued Secretary of 'State; his Lordſhip having artfully inſinuated to 'the Queen, (he had then a miſunderſtanding with 'the Treaſurer) that the friends and relations of the 'King's firſt wife, as Rocheſter, Clarendon, Dartmouth, and others, were in greateſt favour, and in 'poſſeſſion of the beſt places; while her friends, 'though ſhe was Queen conſort, were but ſlenderly 'provided for; and her friends being reckoned to 'be Lord Sunderland, the Lord Chancellor, and 'the Lord Churchill, they began to play their private batteries againſt each other.'

obliged to take (a) [E]. It has, indeed, been ſaid by a French Jeſuit, and from him copied by ſome other ſpiteful writers, that he not only left the King, but alſo laid a deſign for betraying his Majeſty, which was concerted with Colonel Kirke, who commanded at Warminſter (b); and that it was prevented by the King's being taken with a bleeding at the noſe, which was not ſtopped till a vein was opened. Some of theſe writers afterwards aſſerted, that he was concerned in Sir John Fenwicke's plot for reſtoring King James (c). It is impoſſible to believe both theſe ſtories to be true; but we may rationally conclude them to be both abſolutely falſe, as Yonge's contrivance was proved to be, who laboured to fix a conſpiracy of the ſame nature upon his Lordſhip, and Dr. Sprat Biſhop of Rocheſter (d). It is ſuppoſed to have been in conſequence of his Lordſhip's ſolicitation, that Prince George of Denmark took the ſame ſtep, as ſoon after his conſort the Princeſs Anne likewiſe did, by the advice of Lady Churchill (e). His Lordſhip was received with great marks of eſteem and reſpect by the Prince of Orange, who when he advanced with his army as far as Henley, ſent Lord Churchill to London to re-aſſemble his troop of guards; which ſervice he readily performed, and concurred in the application of the Lords to the Prince, at the cloſe of the year, deſiring him to take upon him the adminiſtration (f). But it is very remarkable, that in all the delicate conjunctures of thoſe diſturbed times, he acted not only with caution and circumſpection, but with ſo true a ſpirit of moderation, that, notwithſtanding the malice of one party, and the envy of the other, for he was very early expoſed to both, he maintained his intereſt as well with the Prince of Orange as with Prince George and the Princeſs Anne, and was extremely ſerviceable in compoſing thoſe jars, which had otherwiſe prevented that ſettlement that was afterwards made by the Convention (g). But notwithſtanding his influence and even activity in thoſe important affairs, he carried every thing with ſo much ſilence and ſecrecy, that his ſentiments were never to be collected otherwiſe than by the event; for he was ever an enemy to the noiſe and buſtle, as well as to the heats and fury of a party, taking his meaſures after mature deliberation with ſteadineſs, and behaving to perſons of all ranks and of all ſentiments, with a ſmoothneſs and civility that contented them, and made things eaſy to himſelf. He was entruſted in that critical conjuncture by the Prince of Orange, who gave him the rank of Lieutenant-General, with the care of new modelling the army, and reducing ſome new raiſed regiments, which he performed (h); and the Prince and Princeſs of Orange being declared King and Queen of England, the ſixth of February 1689, Lord Churchill went immediately to congratulate them, and on the fourteenth of the ſame month was ſworn of their Privy-Council, and one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber to the new King (i). On the ninth of April following he was raiſed to the dignity of Earl of Marlborough (k) in the county of Wilts; but though a certain writer poſitively ſays, that he was made Viſcount Churchill by King James (l), yet it may be looked upon as a thing out of doubt, that he never had that title either in England or in Scotland. He aſſiſted at the coronation of their Majeſties, and was very ſoon after appointed to command in chief the Engliſh forces that were ſent over to Holland, in order to make a part of the army of the Allies; and according to his uſual cuſtom haſtened early to his command, arriving at Rotterdam the ſeventeenth of May, from whence he proceeded immediately to the army, which was then commanded by the famous Prince of Waldeck. The Earl of Marlborough was at the head of thoſe forces at the battle of Walcourt, which was fought Auguſt 15, 1689 (m), wherein the Engliſh troops diſtinguiſhed themſelves in ſo extraordinary a man-

[E] From the part that he was obliged to take.] Whoever conſiders the great obligations that Lord Churchill lay under to King James, muſt naturally conclude, that he could not take the reſolution of leaving him, and withdrawing to the Prince of Orange, but with infinite concern and regret; and that this was really the caſe, appears very plainly from the letter which follows; and which has ſo ſtrict a relation to the hiſtory of this illuſtrious perſon, that it is abſolutely neceſſary to give it a place here; the very language in which it is conceived, being, perhaps, the beſt proof of its ſincerity: for if any man will but conſider with himſelf, what under ſuch circumſtances he would have wiſhed to have ſaid, he cannot help ſeeing, that this is what the Lord Churchill has ſaid, in the ſhorteſt and moſt pathetic terms poſſible (14).

(14) Compl. Hiſt. of England, vol. iii. p. 407.

'SIR,

'Since men are ſeldom ſuſpected of ſincerity when 'they act contrary to their intereſts: and though my 'dutiful behaviour to your Majeſty, in the worſt of 'times, (for which I acknowledge my poor ſervices 'much over-paid) may not be ſufficient to incline 'you to a charitable interpretation of my actions; 'yet I hope the great advantage I enjoy under your 'Majeſty, which I can never expect in any other 'change of government, may reaſonably convince 'your Majeſty and the world, that I am acted by an 'higher principle, when I offered that violence to 'my inclination and intereſt, as to deſert your Ma'jeſty at a time, when your affairs ſeem to challenge 'the ſtricteſt obedience from all your ſubjects, much 'more from one, who lies under the greateſt obli'gations imaginable to your Majeſty. This, Sir, 'could proceed from nothing but the inviolable dic'tates of my conſcience, and a neceſſary concern 'for my religion, which no good man can oppoſe, 'and with which I am inſtructed nothing ought to 'come in competition. Heaven knows with what 'partiality my dutiful opinion of your Majeſty has 'hitherto repreſented thoſe unhappy deſigns, which 'inconſiderate and ſelf-intereſted men have framed 'againſt your Majeſty's true intereſt and the Proteſ'tant Religion; but as I can no longer join with 'ſuch, to give a pretence by conqueſt to bring them 'to effect; ſo I will always, with the hazard of my 'life and fortune, (ſo much your Majeſty's due) en'deavour to preſerve your royal perſon and lawful 'rights, with all the tender concern and dutiful re'ſpect, that becomes, &c.'

ner, that we find it both acknowledged and applauded even by the French Hiſtorians; and the Earl of Marlborough gave ſuch extraordinary proofs of his conduct upon this occaſion, that Prince Waldeck, ſpeaking in his commendation to King William, ſaid, That he ſaw more into the art of war in a day, than ſome Generals in many years (n). It is to be obſerved that King William commanded this year in Ireland, which was the reaſon that the Earl of Marlborough was at the head of the Engliſh troops abroad, and gave him an opportunity of laying the foundation of that fame amongſt Foreigners, which he extended afterwards to the utmoſt bounds of Europe [F]. It doth not appear that his Lordſhip was employed any where in the beginning of the next campaign; but towards the cloſe of it he propoſed a ſcheme for reducing Cork, a place of great conſequence in Ireland, and thought to be well fortified, with a ſmall body of troops in the winter when they could be of no uſe elſewhere, to which King William aſſented (o). He landed near Cork in the latter end of the month of September, and though ſome ſmall delay was occaſioned by the Duke of Wirtemberg's diſputing with him the command, yet he very ſoon reduced the place, having obſerved what thoſe who were employed to fortify it had never diſcerned, that it was commanded by an adjacent eminence, upon which erecting a battery, the garriſon capitulated and were made priſoners of war (p). The very important port of Kinſale, and two ſtrong forts that were erected to cover it, ſoon ſhared the ſame fate, all the troops in them being made priſoners likewiſe; and the Earl having thus gloriouſly compleated the deſign which he had ſo wiſely contrived, returned to England before the cloſe of November; and on his firſt appearance at Court, King William was pleaſed to ſay of him (q), That he knew no man ſo fit for a General who had ſeen ſo few compaigns. It was thought proper, and much for the King's ſervice, that the Earl ſhould return to Ireland, which he accordingly did, notwithſtanding the lateneſs of the ſeaſon; and by his prudent management, and directing proper forts to be erected, he kept the Iriſh in cloſe quarters, and yet returned early enough to be ready to attend King William the next ſpring into the field (r). His Majeſty ſhewed the entire confidence which at that time he placed in his Lordſhip, by ſending him with Count Solmes before him to the army, in order to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for opening the campaign (s); and very certain it is, that his behaviour on receiving and in diſcharging this commiſſion, could not but raiſe his credit with ſo wiſe a Prince, ſince it was ſuch as deſerved the applauſe of one of the beſt officers, and moſt experienced Generals of that age, and this not grounded at all upon events; for the great ſcheme the Earl of Marlborough had formed, was actually laid aſide from the oppoſition of the Dutch (t) [G]. His Lordſhip

[F] Which he extended afterwards to the utmoſt bounds of Europe.] It is the fault of almoſt all our hiſtorians, that they do not take pains enough in looking for foreign materials, in reference even to thoſe parts of their hiſtories, which relate to foreign parts; and which therefore it is impoſſible to treat clearly, from the materials that are to be met with at home. In reference to our hero's future exploits, this is very ſeldom the caſe: in reſpect to this campaign it is apparently ſo; for though Prince Waldeck's character of the Earl of Marlborough, has been over and over repeated, yet in our hiſtories it ſeems to be a compliment rather than a character, becauſe we are not ſufficiently acquainted with the facts upon which it was founded. We will endeavour to relate theſe, in as narrow a compaſs as it is poſſible (15). The French army was commanded by the Marſhal de Humieres, and was very little, if at all ſuperior to that of the Allies, commanded by the Prince of Waldeck; and the true deſign of both Generals was the ſame, viz. each intended to hinder the other from paſſing the Sambre. At length however, Prince Waldeck after many marches and countermarches, found means to paſs at Fontaine le Evêque. This alarmed the French Marſhal, who though he pretended to ſeek nothing ſo much as an action, yet was really rather inclined to avoid it (16); and the Allies on the other hand, had no temptation to fight, unleſs they had ſome conſiderable advantage. But on the 15th of Auguſt, N. S. the cavalry of the Allies being for the moſt part abroad for forage, the Duke de Joyeuſe, Lieutenant-General of the day, fell upon and defeated them; and either he or the Marſhal himſelf, were ſo heated by this ſmall ſucceſs, that they reſolved to puſh the affair as far as it would go (17), and at length attacked the little town of Valcourt; which though not regularly fortified, had a very good wall, and was ſtrong by ſituation, lying at the diſtance of about half a league from the Prince of Waldeck's camp, having a ſharp rugged aſcent on the one ſide, and a flat open plain on the other (18). A numerous body of infantry in the town, kept a ſmart fire on the enemy in front, who were alſo galled by a battery of twelve pieces of cannon, Prince Waldeck cauſed to be erected on the eminence before-mentioned. The Earl of Marlborough, at the head of two regiments of horſe and the guards, kept poſſeſſion of the plain, and was a very calm ſpectator of the attack; for ſeeing the infantry of the Allies well covered by the wall, he would give the enemy no diſturbance; but when, after a furious attack which laſted an hour and a half, the enemy found it was impoſſible to prevail, and the Marſhal ſent orders for a retreat; the Earl, as ſoon as they began to move, fell in upon their flank, and as the French themſelves allow, did terrible execution; ſo that this affair coſt them two thouſand killed and wounded, and the loſs of the Allies did not exceed three hundred (19). One of the beſt French writers on the art of war, having given a very ſuccinct account of this action, concludes with this remark, that he mentioned it only as a caution to prevent any General from making ſuch another miſtake, as Marſhal de Humieres made here (20).

[G] From the oppoſition of the Dutch.] To explain this matter a little, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that the reaſon of the King's ſtaying in Holland, was on the ſcore of that famous Congreſs at the Hague, which was one of the moſt illuſtrious ſcenes in his whole reign (21). To have the more leiſure to confer with ſo many great Princes that repaired thither, purely to pay their reſpects to his Majeſty, he ſent the Earl of Marlborough to the army, who, upon his arrival, and receiving an account of the contents of two magazines, one of fire-wood and the other of dry forage, immediately pronounced that the deſign of Louis XIV. was againſt Mons and not Charleroy; upon which he propoſed to the Deputies of the States-General in the army taking ſuch a camp, as would have fruſtrated that deſign; but they depended ſo much upon their own intelligence, and looked upon a ſiege at that time of the year

Lordſhip returned into England in the beginning of the winter, attended the ſervice of Parliament very aſſiduouſly, and his duty at Court as the nature of his office required, for in things of this kind there was no man in the world more punctual; and yet all this attention, all his paſt ſervices, and all the knowledge King William had of the great abilities he had for his ſervice, did not hinder his being diſgraced, and that in a manner ſo ſudden, ſo publick, and with ſuch extraordinary circumſtances, that it was as much the wonder of thoſe times, as the real cauſe of it remains a ſecret even in theſe (u)[H]. The Earl being in waiting at Court, as a Lord of the Bed-chamber, and having in that quality introduced to his Majeſty Lord George Hamilton, a younger ſon of Duke Hamilton, afterwards Earl of Orkney and Field-Marſhal of Great-Britain, and returned from Court to his own houſe without receiving from the King any marks of coldneſs or diſpleaſure, he was followed not long after, by the ſame Lord George Hamilton, with a very ſhort and ſurprizing meſſage, That the King had no farther occaſion for his ſervice (w). As he had been named to attend the King in the next campaign, in quality of Lieutenant-General of Foot, Lionel Talmaſh, Eſq; was appointed in his ſtead; his troop of Guards was given to the Lord Colcheſter; and Lord George Hamilton, who brought him the meſſage, had his regiment of Fuzileers; but his poſt in the Bed-chamber remained vacant ſome time after (x). This ſtrange and unexpected blow was followed by one much ſtranger; for not long after, the Earl, by a warrant under the hand and ſeal of the Lord Viſcount Sydney, then Secretary of State, was committed to the Tower for high-treaſon; which was the effect of a vile conſpiracy formed by ſome deſperate and profligate perſons, who for their juſt deſerts were at the time of framing it priſoners in Newgate, and ſupported by a horrid ſcene of forgery and perjury (y). His Lordſhip was ſoon after bailed, and the whole contrivance being fully and indiſputably detected, a proſecution was commenced againſt the principal author of it, who was tried, convicted (z), and puniſhed. Thus ended this ſtrange affair, which had in all probability rendered a man of a leſs ſettled and ſedate temper a malecontent; but it had no ſuch effect upon the Earl of Marlborough, whoſe behaviour afterwards was as free from circumſpection as from year as a thing ſo impracticable, that they would not yield to his repreſentations; and when Marſhal Boufflers on the 4th of March inveſted Mons on the ſide neareſt the Allies, their aſtoniſhment was ſo great, that they could hardly believe it (22). All precautions, however, were then too late; for the French King beſieged and took the place in much leſs time than could have been expected. Prince Vaudemont being ſome time after with the King at Loo, is ſaid to have ſpoken to him in this manner. 'There is ſomewhat in the Earl of 'Marlborough, that I want words to expreſs; he has 'the fierceneſs of Kirk, the judgment of Laniere, the 'conduct of Mackay, and the intrepidity of Colcheſter 'altogether; and either my ſkill in faces deceives me, 'which yet it never did, or he will make a greater 'figure as a General, than any ſubject your Majeſty 'has.' The King ſmiled and ſaid, Marlborough is obliged to you, but I really believe you will loſe no credit by your prediction (23).

[H] As the real cauſe of it remains a ſecret even in theſe.] It is natural to ſuppoſe, that upon the happening of an event of ſuch conſequence in it's nature, and ſo unexpected in it's manner, as the diſgrace of this noble Peer, abundance of ſtories were told, which however eaſily refuted, from the knowledge of the inconſiſtency of their circumſtances at that time, cannot be ſo well diſtinguiſhed at this diſtance. If the reader has a mind to take a view of theſe and judge for himſelf, he may find them recapitulated in a work, to which he is directed in the margin (24). But as he will probably expect to have ſome reaſon aſſigned here, or at leaſt our thoughts upon the ſubject, we ſhall give them with that freedom and impartiality, which a work of this kind demands; and in which there is nothing farther from our deſign, than either to flatter or to excuſe, except it be to calumniate or defame. It is certain that King William took it much amiſs, that upon ſettling the revenue, an independent proviſion was inſiſted upon for the Princeſs of Denmark, of fifty thouſand pounds per ann. and there were ſome circumſtances that rendered this ſtill more diſagreeable to his conſort. As the whole of this tranſaction was attributed to the advice of the Counteſs of Marlborough, in whom the Princeſs of Denmark was known to have an entire confidence; and as the ſucceſs of this meaſure in both Houſes of Parliament, was aſcribed to the extenſive influence and indefatigable induſtry of the Earl of Marlborough; it ſeems highly reaſonable to imagine, that though he was not immediately diſgraced, yet from this time forward, he could not ſtand upon very favourable terms with the King, and much leſs with the Queen (25). He had alſo the misfortune to be envied and hated by all the King's perſonal favourites, and more eſpecially by the Lord Sydney and Mrs. Villers, afterwards Counteſs of Orkney; who no doubt were not wanting in their endeavours, to add credit to any informations, that were given to his Lordſhip's prejudice. It is no leſs certain, that at this juncture the King's counſels were moſt ſtrangely betrayed; and from thence it has been ſuggeſted, not without ſome degree of probability, that it was inſinuated the Counteſs of Marlborough being miſtreſs of her huſband's ſecrets, which were alſo thoſe of the King; and being intimate alſo with a certain Lady warm in the intereſts of King James, there might poſſibly be a canal of intelligence this way eſtabliſhed; and as the managers of this intrigue might lay hold, as it is ſaid they did, of any remarkable inſtance of diſcovery, it might eaſily produce ſuch a ſudden diſgrace as this of the Earl's, and that too without any explanation. It was immediately followed by forbidding the Counteſs of Marlborough the court, as that was by the retiring of the Princeſs of Denmark from it, and in leſs than ſix weeks the ſham plot followed this. We have an account of the laſt event, from the pen of Lady Marlborough herſelf, which the reader may peruſe, and will from thence judge of the probability of the account that has been given (26). 'Soon after the 'Princeſs going to Sion, a dreadful plot broke out, 'which was ſaid to have been hid ſome where, I don't 'know where, in a flower-pot, and my Lord Marlborough was ſent to the Tower. To commit a Peer 'to priſon, it was neceſſary there ſhould be an affidavit from ſome body of the treaſon. My Lord 'R——y, therefore, S———y of State, had ſent to 'one Young, who was then in gaol for perjury and 'forgery, and paid his fine, in order to make him 'what they call a legal evidence: for as the C——rt 'L——rs ſaid, Young, not having loſt his ears, was 'an irreproachable witneſs. I ſhall not dwell on the 'ſtory of this fellow's villainy, the B——p of R——r 'having given a full account of it in print.' It is very apparent, from all our hiſtories, but more eſpecially from the Journals of the Houſe of Lords, and the Reſolutions that they came to, that theſe accuſations never gained the leaſt degree of credit, excepting amongſt thoſe who were diſpoſed to believe any thing of one, againſt whom they were prejudiced (27).

any colour of guilt. He behaved in Parliament as became an Engliſh Nobleman: he never failed to join with the Courtiers when he thought them in the right, and never oppoſed them from any other principle than a conviction in his own mind that they were in the wrong. His own and his Lady's intereſt with the Princeſs Anne of Denmark, made them ſtill very conſiderable; nor was it in the power of their enemies, who had ſo much influence at one Court, to affect them even in the ſmalleſt degree in the other; and to the honour of both this noble pair it may be truly ſaid, and now they are both dead it may be ſurely ſaid without the leaſt imputation of flattery, that never any perſons appear to have deſerved Court favour better than they did, ſince the greater meaſure they had of it, the better were the affairs of that Court managed in which they enjoyed it (a); ſo that, at this very time, the Earl of Marlborough and his Counteſs merited all things from King William, by the pains they took to keep the Princeſs of Denmark within thoſe bounds of duty and reſpect, from which ſhe wanted not either provocations or ſolicitations to digreſs; and to how great a degree this might have diſtreſſed the Court, the Hiſtory of thoſe times will thoroughly inform the reader (b). The attempt made to repreſent the Earl as embarked in the Aſſaſſination Plot, failed through it's great improbability, which made an extraordinary degree of evidence neceſſary to ſupport it; and yet it came with none at all, excepting the aſſurance given by an unhappy man, who ſaid what he did purely to ſave his life (c). It is certain that the Earl of Marlborough acted very cooly upon this occaſion, ſhewed very little concern, and no degree of warmth. After Queen Mary's death, when their reſpective intereſts brought the two Courts to better agreement, King William thought fit to re-call the Earl of Marlborough to his Privy-Council, and June 19, 1698, appointed him Governor to the Duke of Glouceſter with this extraordinary compliment (d), My Lord, make him but what you are, and my nephew will be all I wiſh to ſee him. His Lordſhip continued from this time forward in his Majeſty's favour to the time of his death, as appears from his having been three times appointed one of the Lords Juſtices during his abſence, viz. July 16, 1698, May 31, 1699, and June 27, 1700 (e). As ſoon as it was diſcerned that the death of Charles II. of Spain would become the occaſion of another general war, the King endeavoured to provide for it early, by ſending over a body of troops to Holland; and on the firſt of June the ſame year, he declared the Earl of Marlborough General of Foot, and Commander in chief of thoſe forces; and on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, he was alſo pleaſed to appoint him Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to their High Mightineſſes; upon which he went immediately over to Holland, where, as a particular mark of their reſpect, the States lodged him in the houſe of Prince Maurice, that he might with more conveniency confer with foreign Miniſters (f). Upon the King's coming over and taking a view of the forces, he dined with the Earl of Marlborough at his quarters on the 30th of September, which was one of the laſt marks of honour and favour he received from that great Prince, who died on the eighth of March following, unleſs we reckon his recommendation of his Lordſhip to the Princeſs of Denmark a little before his death, as the propereſt perſon to be entruſted with the command of the army which was to protect the liberties of Europe (g) [I]. About a week after the King's death, he was elected one of the Knights Companions of the moſt noble Order of the Garter, and ſoon after declared Captain General of all her Majeſty's forces in England and abroad, and was immediately ſent over to the Hague with the ſame character that he had the year before (h). At his firſt audience of the States-General, on the twentieth of March, he made a ſhort, ſolid, and ſenſible ſpeech, in which, without making uſe of many fine-turned periods, he gave them ſuch plain and hearty aſſurances of his Miſtreſs's ſincere intention to purſue the plan that had been formerly ſettled, as fully convinced them of her ſincerity and of his own. His ſtay in Holland was very ſhort, and it was his peculiar felicity to diſpatch much, and even the moſt important buſineſs, in a very little time, of which he gave the ſtrongeſt inſtance here; for the States not only concurred in all that he propoſed, but of their own motive did what he could neither propoſe or expect; for they declared him Captain-General alſo of their forces, with an appointment of one hundred thouſand florins per annum, and left to him the ſettling the rank of General officers, which he did in ſuch a manner as was very honourable for his Sovereign, and entirely to their ſatisfaction (i). On his return to England he found the Queen's Council already divided, ſome being for carrying the war on as auxiliaries only, and others for declaring againſt France and Spain immediately, and ſo becoming principals at once: with theſe the Earl joined, and they carrying their point, war was declared the fourth of May, 1702, which was afterwards approved by Parliament, notwithſtanding the Dutch at that time had not declared (k) [K]. The campaign was opened but with indifferent ſucceſs, which was chiefly owing to the extraordinary caution of the Earl of Athlone, a very brave man, but either a little too circumſpect, or, which is more probable, too much limited in his command. However that matter may be, certain it is, that the army had retired with ſome precipitation under the walls of Nimeguen, before the Earl of Marlborough took the command, which was on the twentieth of June (l). His preſence and his activity ſoon changed the face of affairs; for though his army did not conſiſt of above ſixty thouſand horſe and foot, and that of the enemy was ſuperior in number, commanded by the Duke of Burgundy, whoſe firſt campaign it was, yet the Earl never declined any opportunity of coming to action, but on the contrary preſſed it all he could, and would have forced the French to a battle three ſeveral times, if he had not been hindered by the Dutch Deputies (m). Yet thoſe who blame them do it without reaſon, for the very ſpirit of the army, and their offering the enemy battle, was of great uſe to their affairs; whereas any check would have deſtroyed them, the party which had oppoſed King William beginning to ſhew itſelf in ſeveral cities and provinces, ſo that they had reaſon to be cautious. On the other hand the Earl of Marlborough, far from complaining of their conduct, contented himſelf with ſhewing them clearly what advantages they loſt, by which he gained their confidence highly, as he ſecured the affection of all their officers by his condeſcenſion and politeneſs (n). He very ſoon diſcerned that the States were made uneaſy by the places which the enemy held on their frontiers, and therefore he readily conſented to attack and reduce them; and accordingly, in this ſingle campaign, he made himſelf maſter of the caſtles of Gravenbroeck and Waerts, the towns of Venlo, Ruremond, and Stevenſwaert, together with the city and citadel of Liege, which laſt was taken ſword in hand, and the States, as they had reaſon, teſtified the higheſt ſatisfaction with regard to his Lordſhip's conduct and ſucceſs (o). The Earl of Athlone did a gallant thing upon this occaſion: he wrote to the States, that their thanks were due entirely to the Earl of Marlborough, whoſe meaſures he had oppoſed during the whole campaign, but was not at all leſs pleaſed with the advantages he had obtained. Theſe had like to have been of very ſhort date; for the army ſeparating in the neighbourhood of Liege on the third of November, his Lordſhip was taken the next day in his paſſage by water, by a ſmall party of thirty men from the enemies garriſon at Gueldres; but it being towards night, and the Earl inſiſting upon an old paſs given to his brother, and out of date, he was ſuffered to proceed, and arrived at the Hague, when they were in the utmoſt conſternation on the news of the accident that had befallen him (p). His calmneſs of mind upon this occaſion, and the dexterity with which he extricated himſelf in ſo unexpected a diſaſter, raiſed his credit prodigiouſly, and the Grand Penſionary made him a compliment upon that occaſion, which did him more honour than all his victories; and the modeſty of his Lordſhip's anſwer at leaſt

[I] Which was to protect the liberties of Europe.] There has been a doubt raiſed, as to the high marks of favour ſhewn to the Earl of Marlborough in the laſt years, and even the laſt hours of King William's life and reign; for ſome have attributed them merely to policy. Mr. Hornby, if he was really the author of the book cited in the margin, would perſuade us, that it was not out of affection to the common cauſe, or a ſenſe of the Earl of Marlborough's merit, but from his love to his own country, and his kindneſs to the Earl of Albemarle, that the King took theſe ſteps (28). His words are theſe: 'The late King, 'who was as well acquainted with his qualifications 'as his intereſt, had foreſeen theſe effects of her Ma'jeſty's favour; and his own ſtate of health giving 'him cauſe to apprehend a ſhort continuance in this 'world, he had recommended him to his country'men, as the man on whom they were chiefly to de'pend after his deceaſe; when that he might be leſs 'a ſtranger to them, William reſolves to ſacrifice 'his reſentments to their intereſt, and procure a re'conciliation with the Earl, in order to introduce 'him into their acquaintance; and at the ſame time 'finding that his deluge of bounty to his new fa'vourite, unlike the old one, had been only poured 'like water through a ſieve, and that therefore he 'might ſtand in need of a friend, after the loſs of ſo 'kind a maſter, the King, to kill two birds with one 'ſtone, employed him to manage this affair, as if it 'were entirely of his own motion.' This has been eſteemed a ſevere ſatire upon the memory of King William, but it appears to me in quite another light; for, granting it to be true, it ſhews a high command over his paſſions, and a ſtrong affection for his country; and if theſe are faults, what are virtues! Yet the fact ſeems to be, that with the death of Queen Mary, the King's diſlike to the Earl of Marlborough vaniſhed; and there is no doubt that he was convinced, that all the ſtories told of him were falſe; and as to his parts and abilities, he was acquainted with them long before. In ſhort, his conduct in this reſpect was perfectly right; and as it was the laſt, it was the greateſt action of his life; the cleareſt proof of his having a ſoul ſuperior to little and narrow notions, and entirely taken up with the great view of ſaving England and Holland, and indeed all Europe, from being ſwallowed up by an overgrown power, conducted by a Prince, whoſe ambition was without bounds (29), and who could know no quiet, while his neighbours were free and independent.

[K] Notwithſtanding the Dutch at that time had not declared.] This was a point of very great importance, and it cannot but be allowed, that the arguments which were offered in favour of an auxiliary war, were many of them very plauſible; but the Earl of Marlborough oppoſed it by unanſwerable reaſons, and thoſe conceived, as his always were, in very few words (30). He ſaid, the war took riſe from injuries received heretofore, and the want of ſecurity for the future; that England was as much intereſted in both as any other nation, and was therefore as much bound to act as a principal as they; that war was an evil in itſelf, conſidered in any other light than as an inſtrument, neceſſary to procure a ſafe and ſolid peace; which end the war could never anſwer, if England was not a principal: that a favourable opportunity now offered for reducing France, which, let ſlip, might in all probability never return; and that the true queſtion was, whether conſidering the power of France, England could be ſafe? for if ſhe might, it was better to maintain peace; if not, that kind of war was beſt, that would make her ſafe. The majority of the council concurred with him in opinion, and upon this the declaration of war was drawn, agreeably to the prerogative of the Crown; but it was not actually proclaimed, till the ſentiments of the Parliament were known, and conſequently the ſenſe of the nation. The Earl of Marlborough procured alſo Lord Godolphin's being made High-Treaſurer, which was a thing diſagreeable to many, and not at all pleaſing to that Lord himſelf; but the Earl inſiſted upon it as a meaſure abſolutely requiſite, ſince without it he could not depend upon the Treaſury, or the punctuality of remittances ſo neceſſary to an army in the field, where a ſlip of this kind might, in a ſingle inſtance, prove fatal (31).

equalled the dignity of that compliment (q). On his return to England, he received the higheſt teſtimonies of the ſenſe that his Sovereign and the nation had of his ſervices, expreſſed in the thanks of the two Houſes, and in his being created a Duke, which ſerved only to encourage and confirm him in his noble reſolution of continuing to render them ſtill greater and more important ſervices. A few of the moſt remarkable particulars during his ſtay in the winter, are taken notice of at the bottom of the page [L]. He was on the point of returning to Holland, when, on Feb. 20, 1702-3, his only ſon, the Marquis of Blandford, died at Cambridge at the age of eighteen. This afflicting accident did not however long retard his Grace, who was too wiſe a man to ſuffer even the neareſt of his private concerns to prejudice the publick affairs, now almoſt wholly entruſted to his care; and therefore, after allowing a very ſhort ſeaſon to grief, he paſſed over to Holland, and arrived at the Hague on the ſixth of March. It very ſoon appeared how much the common cauſe was aſſiſted by the wiſe precautions, and judicious foreſight, of the Duke of Marlborough; for he was very careful in obliging the Princes of the Empire, whoſe troops were in the Britiſh pay, to bring them early into the field, and perfectly compleat; and yet in his repreſentations upon this head, though his remarks were very ſmart and ſtrong, they were expreſſed in a language ſo decent and full of reſpect, that they were kindly received, and punctually complied with (r). The French had a great army this year in Flanders, in the Low-Countries, and in that part of Germany which the Elector of Cologne had put into their hands; and the Marſhals Villeroy and Boufflers were ſent to command there, aſſiſted by Prince Tſerclaes de Tilly, the Marquis de Bedmar, and other experienced officers in the Spaniſh ſervice, who, depending entirely upon that promptneſs with which the abſolute power of the French King enabled him to execute all his projects, intended to act offenſively, and to open the campaign with the ſiege of Liege on the eighteenth of April, for which prodigious preparations were made, and all the neceſſary meaſures taken (s). Yet theſe were all broken by the vigilance and activity of the Duke of Marlborough, who, with the army of the Allies, was in the field before them, and on the thirteenth of April inveſted Bonn, the uſual reſidence of the Elector of Cologne (t). This ſiege was carried on with ſo much ſpirit, and with a train of artillery ſo much ſuperior to any thing that had been ſeen, as advanced it's progreſs beyond expectation. The French, in order to create a diverſion, made a haſty march towards Maeſtricht, with a view to have ſurprized the army of the States under Marſhal D'Averquerque, and in their way ſurrounded two battalions that lay in Tongeren; but though theſe were made priſoners of war, yet it was after ſo obſtinate a defence, that the Dutch army had all the time requiſite to provide againſt the ſurprize, ſo that the enemy's deſign miſcarried (u); and after the ſurrender of Bonn on the fourth of May, the Duke of Marlborough re-joined the army of the Allies, and obliged the enemy to retire before him, and to ſhelter themſelves behind their lines, which were ſoon after forced in two places (w) The Duke, upon this, formed a project of making himſelf maſter of Antwerp, which was fruſtrated by Marſhal Boufflers attacking the Dutch General Opdam at Eckeren, on the nineteenth day of June, in which action both ſides claimed the victory (x). The truth is that there were two actions, in the former of which the French were entirely ſucceſsful, but loſt all they obtained in the firſt by the ſecond, and were obliged to abandon the paſſes they had taken, through which the Dutch, under the command of General Schlangenburgh, for Opdam in the beginning of the battle was obliged to fly with a few horſe, made (y) not a ſafe only, but a glorious retreat. The Duke of Marlborough, after this, would have attacked the French lines, but being hindered by the Dutch Deputies, Huy was inveſted and taken. His Grace propoſed again attacking the lines, in a grand Council of War held the fourteenth of Auguſt, in which he was again reſtrained by the Dutch, and the ſiege of Limburgh reſolved upon (z), which was very ſoon taken, as by the cloſe of the year was the city of Gueldres, which left the Dutch ſecure on every ſide except that of Brabant (a). When the campaign was

[L] At the bottom of the page.] The Earl of Marlborough arrived in London on the 28th of November, ſome time after the Queen had been complimented by both Houſes of Parliament, on the ſucceſs of her arms in Flanders; in conſequence of which there had been a publick Thankſgiving on the 4th of November, when her Majeſty went in great ſtate to St. Paul's (32). Soon after, a Committee of the Houſe of Commons, of which Sir Edward Seymour was Chairman, attended him with the thanks of the Houſe. On the 2d of December, her Majeſty declared her intention in Council, of creating his Lordſhip a Duke; which ſhe ſoon after did, by the title of Marquis of Blandford, and Duke of Marlborough. She likewiſe added a penſion of five thouſand pounds a year out of the Poſt-Office during her own life (33), and ſent a meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, ſignifying her deſire that it might attend the honour ſhe had lately conferred; but with this the Houſe would not comply, contenting themſelves in their addreſs to the Queen upon this occaſion, to applaud her manner of rewarding publick ſervice; but declaring their inability to make ſuch a precedent, for alienating the revenue of the Crown (34). The Houſe did not ſhew the leſs reſpect for this to another motion, that was made in conſequence as they very well knew of his advice, viz. that an additional number of troops might be employed in Flanders, to fruſtrate the deſigns of France, as ſhe was then preparing to take the field early, and with a ſuperior force (35). It was with this view, that a vote paſſed for taking ten thouſand foreign troops into Engliſh pay, which was a very ſeaſonable meaſure, and what indeed could not be avoided as things ſtood at that time; and there is no doubt that this raiſed his Grace's reputation not a little with the States-General, as it was an equal proof of his ſincerity and intereſt.

over, his Grace went to Duſſeldorp, to meet the late Emperor, then ſtiled Charles III. King of Spain, who made him a preſent of a very rich ſword from his ſide, with a compliment more glorious than the preſent; and then returning to the Hague, after a very ſhort ſtay he came over to England (b) [M]. When meaſures were properly ſettled at home, the Duke, on the eighth of April 1704, embarked at Harwich for Holland, where he ſpent near a month, in adjuſting all the neceſſary ſteps for executing the greateſt deſign that had been formed within this century; which he covered ſo effectually, that when in the beginning of May he began his march for Germany, the French imagined that he intended to act upon the Moſelle; and the whole of the expedition was conducted with ſuch addreſs, that he paſſed both the Maine and the Neckar before the French had any juſt notion of his intention, and indeed before it was known in it's full extent in Holland (c). After this, he took ſome ſteps that looked as if his deſign tended to the recovery of Landau, which put all the enemy's troops in motion on that ſide, while his Grace continued his march into the heart of the Empire, and had a conference with the Princes Eugene of Savoy, and Lewis of Baden, who complimented him in the higheſt terms on the generoſity of his deſign, and the great prudence he had ſhown in the conduct of it (d). His Grace continued to preſs the march of his troops, and of the reinforcements ſent him from Holland, with the utmoſt vigour, ſo that he arrived before the ſtrong intrenchments of the enemy at Schellenburgh very unexpectedly on the twenty-firſt of June; and though there were in them twenty thouſand men, and it was afternoon when they arrived, yet he could not be perſuaded to delay the attack, but began it with the Engliſh and Dutch infantry, before the Imperialiſts, under Prince Lewis of Baden, could come up (e). The diſpute was very obſtinate and bloody, the Allies were twice repulſed, but at the third attack the Imperialiſts forced the intrenchment on the right, and ſoon after the Engliſh and Dutch did the ſame on the left, ſo that the enemy were obliged to retire very precipitately, after loſing one third of their troops at leaſt (f). It was upon this occaſion that the Emperor wrote the Duke a letter with his own hand, acknowledging his ſervices in the moſt obliging manner, and offering him the title of a Prince of the Empire, which he modeſtly declined (g), till the Queen afterwards commanded him to accept of it. This great ſtroke, by which a way was opened for the relief of the Empire, was, by the Germans themſelves, juſtly and univerſally aſcribed to the Duke [N]. He proſecuted

[M] Came over to England.] His Grace arrived here on the 13th of October 1703, and ſoon after King Charles III. of Spain, whom he had accompanied to the Hague, came likewiſe over to England, and arrived at Spithead the day after Chriſtmas. His Grace the Duke of Somerſet, and his Grace of Marlborough, were immediately ſent down to receive and to conduct him to Windſor (36). On the 28th he lay at Petworth, and on the 29th in the evening, he arrived in company of the two Dukes at Windſor. Upon this occaſion, I muſt mention what moſt of our Hiſtorians have overlooked, viz. that on the 30th the Duke of Marlborough introduced to his Catholick Majeſty the Spaniſh Merchants, and procured for them the ſtrongeſt aſſurance of protection and favour, that the King could give (37). In the beginning of the month of January, the States-General deſired her Majeſty to give leave to his Grace of Marlborough to come to the Hague, which her Majeſty granted, and his Grace embarked on the 15th of the ſame month on board the Mary Yacht, in which he paſſed over to Rotterdam (38), and went from thence immediately to the Hague, where he communicated to the Penſionary, his ſenſe of the neceſſity there was, of attempting ſomething the next campaign for the relief of the Emperor, whoſe affairs at this time were in the utmoſt diſtreſs; having the Bavarians on one ſide, and the Hungarian malecontents on the other, making incurſions to the very gates of Vienna, while his whole force ſcarcely enabled him to maintain a defenſive war; which unleſs ſpeedily relieved, would certainly exhauſt him. The Penſionary approved ſo much of the Duke's ſcheme as he opened to him, but it was agreed that he ſhould not explain himſelf to the States: only meaſures were concerted, as if the next campaign was to open upon the Moſelle; and even in this an air of ſecrecy was obſerved, which had very good effects. Matters being thus adjuſted, and the Generals named who were to command on the frontiers of the State's dominions, the Duke returned to England (39) on the 14th of February following.

[N] Was by the Germans themſelves juſtly and univerſally aſcribed to the Duke.] The tranſactions of this campaign are ſo peculiarly glorious in reſpect to the memory of this noble perſon, that we are under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of detaining the reader, upon ſome few of the moſt remarkable circumſtances, that demonſtrate the veracity of what is aſſerted in the text. In the firſt place, the great capacity of the Duke is viſible, in forming ſo vaſt a deſign in his own mind, with reſpect to which he could not either aſk or receive advice, but was obliged to lay the whole plan, and to contrive the means of overcoming the many difficulties, excluſively of all the hazards of war that lay in the way of it's execution, without the leaſt aſſiſtance. We are next to advert to the great ſecrecy and wonderful addreſs, with which he managed it. At home it was entruſted only to the Queen, the Prince of Denmark, and the Lord Treaſurer Godolphin; abroad, only the Penſionary and another perſon had any intimation of it, neither was it communicated to them in it's full extent. But what is ſtill more admirable, there was no intimation given of it to the Imperial Court, as appears from the memorial of the Imperial Miniſter, preſented to the Queen in the middle of April, when the Duke was actually on his march, beſeeching her aſſiſtance. It is no wonder therefore, that with all their intelligence, the French were deceived to the very laſt, and did not apprehend the Duke's true deſign, till he was within ſight of the Danube. His Grace's dexterity, in opening his deſign to the States by degrees, and thereby obtaining their conſent, not only to carry their troops with him to ſuch a diſtance, but alſo to have them augmented by conſiderable reinforcements, from the nature of their conſtitution at all times, and the ſituation they were in at this critical conjuncture, will to future ages ſeem incredible. His celerity in performing ſo extraordinary a march, as from the frontiers of Holland to the Danube, in about fifty days, without prejudice to his troops, is aſtoniſhing; but the moſt ſurprizing ſtroke of all was, the firmneſs the Duke expreſſed in attacking the enemy the ſame day that he arrived, when their entrenchments were not half finiſhed, and before they were recovered from the confuſion into which he had thrown them, by his unexpected arrival; to which, and to his perſiſting in making the laſt effort, the ſucceſs of this affair (with the aſſiſtance of the divine favour) profecuted this ſucceſs with all the diligence imaginable, and laboured to bring the enemy to a deciſive battle, which the Elector of Bavaria declined, by retiring under the walls of Augſburgh. At length, being joined by a new French army under the command of Marſhal Tallard, he advanced to Hochſtet, where, on the ſecond of Auguſt, he was attacked by the Allies (b). Prince Lewis of Baden being detached with part of the army to make the ſiege of Ingoldſtat, the remainder conſiſted of about fifty-two thouſand men, commanded on the right by Prince Eugene, and on the left by the Duke of Marlborough; the French and Bavarians were about ſixty thouſand, commanded by Marſhal Tallard on the right, and on the left by the Elector of Bavaria and Marſhal Marſin: the attack, though bold and hazardous, was conducted with all the caution imaginable; and the Duke receiving the ſacrament the evening before, went to the field with a reſolution to conquer or to die (i). The diſpute was for ſome hours bloody and doubtful; but at length victory declared on the ſide of the Allies, the enemy loſing at leaſt half, ſome accounts ſay two-thirds, of their army, of whom thirteen thouſand, and amongſt them Marſhal Tallard, with twelve hundred officers, were made priſoners, and fourteen thouſand killed or drowned, beſides a vaſt number that were loſt in their precipitate retreat (k). After this glorious action, by which the empire was ſaved, and the whole electorate of Bavaria conquered, the Duke continued his purſuit till he forced the French to re-paſs the Rhine, and then Prince Lewis of Baden laid ſiege to Landau, while the Duke and Prince Eugene covered it; and if, through the ſlowneſs of the Germans, that ſiege had not laſted too long, his Grace had projected an expedition on the Moſelle, in order to have forced a paſſage that way into France: as it was, he took poſſeſſion of Homburgh, Treves, &c. and had the pleaſure of ſeeing Landau taken on the twelfth of November, after ſixty-ſix days open trenches (l). He made a tour alſo to Berlin, and by a ſhort negotiation ſuſpended the diſputes between the King of Pruſſia and the Dutch, by which he gained the good-will of both parties. When the campaign was over, he returned to Holland, where he received the publick thanks of the States for his ſervices in the field and in the cabinet, and on the fourteenth of December he arrived in England, laden with the trophies of his victories (m), by which he gained a reputation truly immortal [O]. As the Duke's deſigns coſt him much greater pains than the execution of them, ſo when they were once formed he was unwilling to part with them, what obſtacles ſoever lay in the way of compleating them. He meditated therefore all the winter the project he had formed of penetrating from the Moſelle, which project, by the way, is the original after which many have been copied ſince; and upon his going over to Holland, in the latter end of March, he laboured to put every thing in order for this favourite expedition, which might poſſibly have ended the war that campaign, but muſt have reduced the enemy to the greateſt extremity in the next. The raiſing of magazines, which was the greateſt obſtacle apprehended in the execution of the Duke's ſcheme, he had wiſely provided for, by cauſing them to be erected the winter before at Triers, and under various pretences keeping them there to this time (n).

vour) was abſolutely due. The ſame thing happened again at Hochſtet, where moſt of the Generals would have diſſuaded his Grace from fighting; but he was inflexible, well knowing that to do nothing was the ſureſt way to be undone, and that delay would have made the hazard greater; ſo that we may truly ſay, the fortune of the Duke of Marlborough aroſe from his conduct; and that he was victorious, in conſequence of his chuſing the fitteſt times for actions; being always cool and compoſed, obſerving and making the moſt of every advantage, and rendering his forces ſuperior to the enemy, by that confidence which he placed in them, and which through the whole war they never failed to juſtify, by ſhewing that ſpirit, which Prince Eugene frankly ſaid, he never ſaw in any other troops.

[O] By which he gained a reputation truly immortal.] It is impoſſible within the narrow compaſs to which we are confined, to mention all the honours this hero received; and it is the leſs neceſſary, as not our own hiſtories only, but thoſe of foreign nations alſo, will always preſerve them. We ſhall content ourſelves, therefore, with remarking, that, excluſively of the medals ſtruck, and the Poems written in honour of this victory, of which Mr. Addiſon's was really worthy of it, all the other teſtimonies of a juſt ſenſe of his ſervices were given, that even thoſe ſervices could merit. He brought over with him Marſhal Tallard, and twenty-ſix other officers of diſtinction, one hundred twenty-one ſtandards, and a hundred and ſeventy-nine colours, which by her Majeſty's order, were put up in Weſtminſter-Hall (40): he was received by the Queen and her Royal Conſort, with the higheſt marks of eſteem, and had the ſolemn thanks of both Houſes of Parliament (41). Beſides this, the Commons addreſſed her Majeſty to perpetuate the memory of this victory, which ſhe did, by granting him the honour of Woodſtock, with the Hundred of Wotton, that was veſted in him and his heirs for ever by act of Parliament, which paſſed on the 14th of March following, with this remarkable clauſe, that they ſhould be held by rendering to the Queen, her heirs and ſucceſſors, on the 2d of Auguſt, every year for ever, at the Caſtle of Windſor, a ſtandard, with three fleurs de lys painted thereon (42). On the ſixth of January, the Duke was feaſted by the City; and on the 8th of February, the Commons addreſſed the Queen to teſtify their thanks for the wiſe treaty which the Duke had concluded with the Court of Berlin, by which a large body of Pruſſian troops were ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Duke of Savoy (43); ſo equal was this great man to all things, and ſo great was his dexterity in managing the moſt arduous negotiations; which he concluded in leſs time, than moſt miniſters would have taken to enter upon buſineſs; and at the ſame time ſo extenſive were his views, that every ſcene of action was alike the object of his care; and he had no ſooner freed Germany from her fears, than he provided effectually for the relief of Italy, by engaging Prince Eugene to take upon him the command there, and by procuring for him this neceſſary and effectual aſſiſtance; ſo that in reality he was the very ſoul of the war, animating and directing it every where for the ſervice of the common cauſe, and for the glory of his country.

The States-General, upon his laying before them the great advantages that would follow from a ſucceſsful campaign on the Moſelle, conſented, without much difficulty, to his leading their troops thither; and Prince Lewis of Baden alſo, without whoſe concurrence he could do nothing, promiſed him an interview at Creutznach. His Grace having done every thing at the Hague, and having marched part of the troops with a view to his great deſign, went in perſon to Coblentz, where he arrived on the ſixth of May; and propoſed two days after to have had an interview with Prince Lewis; but the next morning his Highneſs excuſed himſelf by a meſſage, on account of his ill ſtate of health (o). Upon this his Grace ſet out for Raſtadt, the place of his Highneſs's reſidence, where he had a long conference with him, in a manner againſt his will, in which it is ſaid his Highneſs promiſed him to concur as far as in him lay to the execution of his deſigns; upon which the Duke returned to the army, paſſed the Moſelle, and diſpoſed every thing for the ſiege of Saar Lewis; but Prince Lewis of Baden falling ſick again, and the Germans failing in every thing, the Duke was able to do nothing (p). On the other hand, the French, inſtead of reinforcing the army that ſhould have oppoſed the Duke of Marlborough, purſued their plan of operations in the Low-Countries, as if they had depended upon this diſappointment, and taking the advantage of the weakneſs of Marſhal D'Averquerque's army, recovered Huy, and laid ſiege to Liege (q). His Grace, upon this, decamped on the ſixth of June, and made ſo quick a march with his cavalry, that he obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege of the citadel of Liege, and ſoon changed the face of affairs on that ſide. But his back was no ſooner turned, than Monſ. d'Aubach, the Palatine General, who was left to act upon the defenſive on the Moſelle, retired precipitately, and, as if he meant to put it out of his Grace's power ever to reſume his deſign of penetrating into France that way, burnt all his magazines at Triers, upon the firſt motion of the French towards him, without waiting for orders (r). The Duke, having recovered Huy, reſolved to force the French lines, which ſome of the Dutch Generals oppoſed; but Marſhal D'Averquerque, and the preſent King of Sweden, declaring poſitively in favour of the Duke's propoſition, it was carried into execution with all the eaſe imaginable; by which, excluſively of the glory of the action, the French ſuffered a very conſiderable loſs, and the Elector of Bavaria, and Marſhal Villeroy, were obliged to retire with precipitation (s). Yet the Duke miſſed his principal deſign, which was recovering Lorrain, Bruſſels, and Antwerp, by the ſlowneſs of ſome of the Dutch Generals. He was, in like manner, diſappointed in two other deſigns; in one, by the obſtinacy of General Schlangenburg; in the other, by the oppoſition of the Dutch deputies, which occaſioned pretty warm diſputes with the States, who at laſt gave him ſome kind of ſatisfaction. The campaign ended ſoon after with ſome ſucceſſes, which would have made a conſiderable figure in a campaign under any other General, but are ſcarcely worth mentioning where the Duke of Marlborough commanded, who, though he bore them with admirable patience, yet was infinitely chagrined with ſuch a train of diſappointments (t). The ſeaſon for action being over, he made a tour to the courts of Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover. At the firſt of theſe he acquired the entire confidence of the new Emperor Joſeph, who made him a preſent of the principality of Mindelheim; at the ſecond he renewed the contract for the Pruſſian forces, and obtained every thing he aſked from a Prince, with whom all other Miniſters could do nothing; and, at the laſt, he reſtored a perfect harmony, and adjuſted every thing to the Elector's ſatisfaction; after which he returned to the Hague, where, in a ſingle conference, he induced the States to agree to their proportion of the pay of ten thouſand men that were to be ſent into Italy, and towards the cloſe of the year, embarked for, and arrived ſafely in, England (u) [P]. All things being concerted for rendering the next campaign more ſucceſsful than the former, mer, his Grace, in the beginning of April 1706, embarked for Holland. He remained at the Hague about three weeks, and found the States very well diſpoſed to perform the promiſe they had given him, of making him eaſy in his command; which was not only a thing very reaſonable in itſelf, but highly conducive to their intereſts, and very ſuitable to the inclinations of the people. In order to this General Schlangenburg was laid aſide, which was a thing of great conſequence with reſpect to other officers, and the Field Deputies were given to underſtand, that a very high deference was on all occaſions to be paid to his Grace's ſentiments (w). On his arriving in the army, which was in the neighbourhood of Liege, he found new difficulties to ſtruggle with. He had intelligence that the French army under Marſhal Villeroy was perfectly compleat, while, as to that of the Allies, the Daniſh horſe abſolutely inſiſted upon being paid their arrears before they left their winter quarters; and as for the Pruſſian troops that were ordered to join them, they were at a great diſtance. While things were in this ſituation the French paſſed the Deule, whence the Duke very eaſily diſcerned that they hoped to treat him as they had done the laſt year, and placed their whole confidence in his diſappointments. To prevent this his Grace applied himſelf to the Duke of Wirtembergh, with whom, ever ſince the little diſpute they had in Ireland, he had a ſtrict friendſhip; and having given him his own, and procured the Dutch Field Deputies to engage their promiſe, that all arrears ſhould be duly paid, his Serene Highneſs generouſly declared that he thought it was all his Daniſh Majeſty could expect, and that he would march his troops immediately without waiting for that Monarch's orders (x). This was a thing of the utmoſt conſequence; for the French relied upon the obſtinacy of the Danes, which induced them to hurry on an action in ſuch a manner, that the Elector of Bavaria was forced to ride poſt to it, and ſcarcely arrived in time. They were deceived in their expectations, for the Daniſh horſe joined the Confederates on Saturday the eleventh of May, and the next morning, being Whitſunday, was fought the battle of Ramillies. The French muſt be allowed the honour of having offered the Allies battle, which, if they had not done, the Duke would have forced them to an action the next day (y). It began about one, and the Duke ſoon obſerving that his right wing would not be able to act an account of a moraſs, drew twenty ſquadrons from thence to the aſſiſtance of the left (z), where the Dutch cavalry had been broken by the French houſhold troops; but the Daniſh horſe, ſupported by this reinforcement, and encouraged by the preſence of the Duke, broke them in their turn, and carried all before them. The Duke was twice in the utmoſt danger, once by a fall from his horſe, and a ſecond time by a cannon ſhot, that took off the head of Colonel Bringfield as he was holding the ſtirrup for his Grace to re-mount (a). The diſpute was indeed but very ſhort; ſome of the beſt accounts ſay not above half an hour, others two hours, and then the French began every where to give way; ſo that the rout ſoon became total, and their baggage being placed between the two lines of the army, not only rendered the day irrecoverable, but hindered all regularity in the retreat (b). The loſs of the enemy was very great; about ſix thouſand killed, nearly the ſame number taken, and not many fewer than theſe deſerted: their whole train, conſiſting of fifty pieces of cannon, ſeveral kettle-drums, one hundred and twenty ſtandards and colours, demonſtrated the entireneſs of the victory (c). If any farther proof of this was neceſſary, it was given by their retreat, or rather by the precipitation of their flight, by which they abandoned a great part of Brabant without any apparent neceſſity; and this was ſo far improved by the vigilance and wiſdom of the Duke, that Louvain, Bruſſels, Mechlin, and even Ghent and Bruges, ſubmitted to King Charles III. of Spain without a ſtroke, and Oudenard ſurrendered upon the firſt ſummons. The city of Antwerp followed this example, and thus, in the ſhort ſpace of a fortnight, the Duke reduced all Brabant, and the marquiſate of the Holy Empire, to the obedience of King Charles (d). He gave, upon this occaſion, ſuch extraordinary marks of diſintereſtedneſs, as deſerved more regard than have been hitherto paid them. Inſtead of making thoſe advantages to which his victory entitled him, he received and protected the inhabitants of theſe places as the King of Spain's ſubjects; and when the government of the Auſtrian Netherlands was offered him with the uſual appointments, he generouſly refuſed it, put the adminiſtration into the hands of the States of the province, and by various other inſtances gave inconteſtible proofs, that he did all for the Common Cauſe, and nothing for himſelf (e). In the latter end of May he made a ſhort tour to the Hague, in order to prevail upon the States to have conſented to certain meaſures, particularly the ſiege of Dunkirk, by which he hoped to have ſhortened the war; but not being able to prevail, he was obliged to purſue his ſucceſſes in the way moſt agreeable to them, and accordingly ordered Oſtend to be inveſted, before which the trenches were opened on the eighteenth of June (f). It was during this ſiege, that, in my poor judgment, his Grace committed the greateſt overſight in his whole life; for going to viſit this ſiege, he expoſed his perſon for more than an hour in the trenches, during as warm a fire as ever was ſeen; and this notwithſtanding a letter the Queen did him the honour to write him on his victory, with her own hand, in which the only command ſhe gave him was, Be careful of yourſelf (g). The ſiege was conducted with ſo much vigour that the place ſurrendered on the twenty-ſeventh.

[P] Embarked for, and arrived ſafely in, England.] A new Parliament had been called this year, and great expectations were formed of their conduct, and it ſoon appeared with very good reaſon (44). Upon the 7th of January, the Houſe of Commons, came to a reſolution to thank his Grace of Marlborough, as well for his prudent negotiations, as for his great ſervices. But notwithſtanding this, it very ſoon appeared, that there was a ſtrong party formed againſt the war; and a pamphlet was publiſhed, in which the conduct of his Grace of Marlborough was directly attacked; but the author ſoon after thought proper to write a letter (45) to the Duke by way of recantation. An attempt was alſo made in the Houſe of Lords, to have procured from her Majeſty all the papers relating to the laſt campaign, in hopes that ſomething might have been found in them, which might have proved a ground for cenſuring his Grace's conduct; which, in the mean time, to take off all ſuſpicion, they very highly commended, and ſpoke with the utmoſt bitterneſs of Prince Lewis of Baden and the Dutch (46). But this alſo was ſeen through and defeated, chiefly through the prudence of the Duke, who ſpoke always with much moderation of what had happened abroad; and having ſeen Prince Lewis of Baden after the campaign was over, in the tour he made through Germany, he treated him with the utmoſt deference and reſpect (47). Her Majeſty at this time had ſome overtures made to her by the Duke of Savoy, in reference to the attempt upon Toulon, which were referred to the Duke of Marlborough, ſuch was the entire confidence the Queen repoſed in him at that time (48); and as to the plan of the enſuing campaign, it was alſo entirely referred to his Grace; who at that time was very apprehenſive that the French would act as they had done the year before, entirely on the defenſive; and had therefore fixed on ſeveral ſteps proper to have forced them to change that ſcheme, if their own politicks (49) had not, very fatally for them, had that effect, as the reader will ſee in the text.

ſeventh. The ſtrong fortreſs of Menin, eſteemed the maſter-piece of Marſhal Vauban, defended by a numerous garriſon under the command of one of the beſt officers in France, was inveſted next, the trenches opened before it on the twenty-fourth of July, and the ſiege being carried on with extraordinary diligence and warmth, the place ſurrendered on the eleventh of Auguſt (b). Dendermonde, which had been blocked up ſoon after the battle of Ramillies, ſurrendered, after a ſhort ſiege, on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month; and on the fifth of September Aeth was inveſted, and the trenches opened before it upon the eleventh. It was expected that this place would have made a pretty long defence, but, following the example of the reſt, it ſurrendered on the twenty-firſt. The Duke de Vendoſme had been ſent to command in Flanders inſtead of Marſhal Villeroy, and though without doubt he was as good an officer, and as brave a man, as any ſubject the French King had, and notwithſtanding his army was reinforced to an equality at leaſt with that of the Allies, he remained a calm ſpectator of the Duke's conqueſts, not daring to undertake any enterprize of importance, with an army that had quite loſt their ſpirits (i). The forces of the Allies after this glorious campaign being about to ſeparate, his Grace, on the ſixteenth of October, went to the Hague, where the propoſals which France had made for a peace, contained in a letter from the Elector of Bavaria to the Duke of Marlborough, were communicated to the Miniſters of the Allies; after which his Grace embarked on the fifteenth of November for England, where he arrived the day following (k) [Q]. The meaſures neceſſary for promoting the ſucceſs of the enſuing campaign being very early ſettled at home, and it being found abſolutely neceſſary that his Grace ſhould make a tour to Germany before the army entered upon action, he propoſed to have been at the Hague before the end of March; but being hindered by contrary winds, he did not arrive there before the fifth of April, 1707 (l). He explained to the States the motives of his journey to Saxony, whither he went to confer with the King of Sweden, whoſe ſituation was at that time ſuch as enabled him to have given law to Europe. His grace accordingly made a journey to his Swediſh Majeſty's head quarters, preſented him with the Queen his Miſtreſs's letters, and after a very ſucceſsful negotiation, in which it is certain that he made very favourable impreſſions on the mind of that Prince, and gained a perfect acquaintance with his deſigns (m), he returned by Hanover to the Hague, and having acquainted the States with the iſſue of his journey, he ſet out for Bruſſels, where he arrived on the ſecond of May (n). The army of France was commanded this year by two great Princes, who were alſo great officers, the Elector of Bavaria, and the Duke of Vendoſme. They were both eſteemed enterprizing in their conduct, as they were indiſputably very gallant in their perſons; yet the higheſt honour to which they aſpired, with a ſuperior army, was to move about a little from camp to camp without being obliged to fight, to which the Duke of Vendoſme would never conſent (o). His Grace of Marlborough was a little deceived in the beginning of the campaign: he knew the ſtrength of the French army, and was well acquainted with the character of the Princes before-mentioned, and therefore when he knew they had aſſembled their army without the lines, he took it for granted they intended to give him battle; upon which he advanced towards them, who were then encamped on the plains of Flerus, but, upon the approach of the Allies, the Duke de Vendoſme occupied the paſs at Ronquiers by ſo ſtrong a detachment, that the Duke of Marlborough ſaw plainly, his intention was neither to offer battle nor to be forced to fight, upon which he was obliged to retire towards Bruſſels (p). His intention at the beginning of the campaign was to have beſieged either Mons or Charleroy, in caſe the enemy declined fighting, and this the Dutch Deputies did not in the leaſt oppoſe; but the Duke de Vendoſme having ſeized the ſtrong camp of Gemblours, his Grace of Marlborough ſaw plainly that there was no venturing to make a ſiege, without expoſing all the great open towns of Brabant to be re-taken by the French; and this kept him in a kind of inaction during the remaining part of the campaign, excepting that, upon his receiving advice of the enemy's having detached a few ſquadrons and thirteen battalions into Provence, he advanced with a reſolution of attacking Vendoſme, even in the ſtrong camp of Gemblours (q). But upon his approach Vendoſme decamped, and by very quick marches gained a ſtronger poſt at Peiton, whither his Grace followed, and puſhed him ſo cloſe, that they were obliged to decamp again; and at laſt, after ſhifting from place to place, retired within their lines; where, having the Schelde and ſtrong entrenchments before them, the army of the Duke of Vendoſme could bear the approach of the Allies, without deſiring to get out of their way (r). The Duke, finding all his endeavours to no purpoſe, and the weather being grown very bad, quitted the army on the twenty-third of September, and went to the Hague, from whence he ſet out again ſoon after for Franckfort, where he laboured to have infuſed ſome degree of warmth into the Princes of the Empire, and to have drawn his Imperial Majeſty to have ſhewn more punctuality to his engagements than he had done hitherto ſince the war began; in which, not meeting with his uſual ſucceſs, he returned again to the Hague (s); and after encouraging the States to perſiſt in the reſolutions they had taken for the ſupport of the Common Cauſe, he embarked for England, without ſhewing any apparent concern at the cloſe of the moſt barren campaign he ever made [R]. The very unexpected diſtaſtes the Duke had met with through the whole courſe of the winter, as well as the repeated applications of the States-General, induced him to go to Holland early in the ſpring; and arriving at the Hague on the nineteenth of March, he found there Prince Eugene of Savoy, who had been at infinite pains to engage the Court of Vienna, and ſome of the Princes of the Empire, to come into a ſcheme which he knew would be grateful to the Duke, as well as of high conſequence to the Common Cauſe (t). In order to compleat this, however, it was abſolutely neceſſary to engage the Elector of Hanover, afterwards King George I. to part with ſome regiments that were to have compoſed the army that he was to command on the Rhine; and this the Duke of Marlborough was to undertake, which he did, and ſucceeded in his commiſſion (u). Prince Eugene, who made a tour through the Empire, met his Grace at Hanover, and concerted with him there the operations of the campaign; after which he returned to Vienna, giving out that he was to command a ſeparate body upon the Moſelle, which was underſtood to be avoiding a junction with the Duke of Marlborough (w). The giving credit to this circumſtance, trifling as it ſeemed, proved the ruin of the French affairs; for at the ſame time the Duke of Burgundy was ſent to command in Flanders, Marſhal Berwick was ſent to oppoſe Prince Eugene upon the Rhine; but he having ſeveral days march of him, moved with ſuch unuſual celerity, that his forces preſerved the advantages they had acquired till they had joined the Allies. The French, under the Dukes of Burgundy and Vendoſme, had a very fine army of one hundred thouſand men (x); whereas, after draining all his garriſons, the Duke of Marlborough could not take the field with full fourſcore. The enemy might have preſerved this ſuperiority through the campaign, if they had taken care to facilitate their junction with Marſhal Berwick; but the Duke of Burgundy, miſled by the advice of a few favourites, croſſed the Duke of Vendoſme in every thing, and having ſucceeded in his deſign of ſurprizing Ghent and Bruges, fancied he was able to act by his own lights, and thereupon caused the little town of Oudenard (y) to be invested, which brought on a battle, contrary to that Prince's design, who, to avoid it, would have retired towards Ghent, and by this means the French army were attacked on the thirtieth of June 1708, when they were in great disorder, and without any difficulty defeated, with the loss of four thousand killed, and seven thousand taken prisoners, and about one hundred standards and colours; and would have suffered still more in their retreat, if the Duke of Vendosme had not commanded the rear guard (z). But, as it was, the consequences of the defeat were very fatal, and made way for the siege of Lisle, which was invested by the Prince of Nassau, father to the late hereditary Stadtholder of the United Provinces, on the second of August (a). This was by far the boldest undertaking of the kind during the war, and many have not scrupled to stile it a very rash attempt. It is very probable, that the Duke of Marlborough depended on the vigour and spirit with which Prince Eugene would carry on the siege on one side, and the misunderstandings that reigned amongst the French Generals on the other, and the event shewed that he was not mistaken in his conjecture; for notwithstanding the French had, according to their own accounts, an army superior to the Duke's by above a fourth, commanded by the Dukes of Burgundy, Vendosme, and Berwick, yet they did nothing; so that October 12, the town of Lisle surrendered, and Marshal Boufflers retired into the citadel (b). To relieve this important place, the Elector of Bavaria, on the fifteenth of December, made a very brisk attempt upon Brussels, in which he was disappointed by the vigilance of the Duke of Marlborough, and by his passing the Schelde with the army under his command, which was looked upon as a thing impracticable (c); and the Duke of Marlborough himself considered it as so high a providence, that he caused a General Thanksgiving to be religiously observed throughout the whole army, on the second of December N. S. (d) and on the ninth the citadel of Lisle surrendered, which was one of the greatest blows the French received during the war (e). His Grace, to compleat the success of this campaign, caused Ghent to be invested, which was very soon surrendered; in consequence of which the French abandoned Bruges, and the rest of the places they had surprized in the beginning of the campaign (f); so that the Duke returned to the Hague, and from thence to England, as usual, crowned with laurels, and the universal acclamations of his countrymen and their Allies [S]. The French King thought fit, in the beginning of the year 1709, to set on foot a negotiation for peace, in which it is thought he had three principal points in view, and failed in them all (g). The first was, to quiet the minds of his own subjects, labouring under the deepest distress, and afflicted with calamities the most grievous that a nation can sustain, war, sickness, and famine; the second, sowing jealousies and suspicions amongst the Confederates, in hopes of bringing some of them either to desert the Common Cause, or to prosecute it with less vigour; the third, to amuse the Allies with false hopes of peace, and thereby retard their military preparations. These negotiations induced the Queen to send his Grace back to Holland, in the latter end of the month of March, with the character of her Plenipotentiary, which was a point of very great consequence, and contributed not a little to the enemy's disappointment. After his Grace's return to England, the French King made another attempt, by sending the Marquis de Torcy, his Minister for foreign affairs, into Holland. This measure proved also without effect; for the Duke of Marlborough had contrived to have the preliminaries for a peace, that were not only proposed, but signed and ratified by the Queen his mistress, so drawn, that the concerns of all the Allies were equally and effectually provided for; by which means the French arts, instead of disturbing the [S] And the universal acclamations of his countrymen and their Allies.] The House of Commons this year gave a very uncommon testimony of their respect for the Duke of Marlborough; for, besides addressing the Queen, they, on the twenty-second of January, voted thanks to his Grace unanimously, and ordered them to be transmitted to him abroad by the Speaker (59). His Grace returned to England on the twenty-fifth of February, and on his first appearance in the House of Lords, the thanks of that august assembly were given him by the Lord Chancellor Cowper, to which, as upon all other occasions, the Duke gave an answer full of modesty, gratitude, and deep respect (60). His stay was so very short, that we have no need to dwell long upon what passed here in the winter: it is sufficient to say, that those who were apprehensive of the dangerous effects that might attend the artificial proposals that France made for the conclusion of a general peace, were also of opinion, that nobody was so capable of setting their danger in a true light in Holland as his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, which was the reason of his going thither (61). We have had occasion to shew, in some instances before, that whatever might be said from party resentment, the Duke was far enough from desiring to protract the war; and that the steps which his enemies had mentioned as instances of his inclination that way, were in reality taken from no other motive than that of necessity: he would have acted with more vigour, and have brought things sooner to a conclusion, if he could; but not being able to do this, he did all in his power abroad, and bore, with great temper, the groundless reflections that were made upon his conduct at home. In respect to peace, his sentiments were the same: he was far from being averse to it, but then he was desirous that this peace should be safe and solid, which he thought it could not be if the power of France was not greatly reduced; and as he had the satisfaction of seeing that the war was in a fair way of doing this effectually, he was loth to lose a certainty, though attended with many inconveniencies, for an uncertainty that he foresaw must be attended with more. He had the good fortune to bring the States-General entirely into his sentiments, and thereby defeated the French in their negotiations, as clearly as he had ever done their forces; so that he might be truly said to triumph over them in the cabinet as well as in the field, and to have done equal honour to his country as a Statesman and a Soldier.

[R] Of the moſt barren campaign he ever made.] After the fatigue of ſo diſſatisfactory a negotiation as that of Franckfort, the troubleſome appendix of his labours in the field, which this year only repaid him not with laurels, his Grace no doubt hoped for ſome quiet at his return. His hopes, however, were diſappointed: that fire which had been ſuſpected the laſt year, had broken out in his abſence; and it was known that the Queen had a female favourite who was in a fair way of gaining ground of the Ducheſs, and that ſhe liſtened to the inſinuations of a Stateſman who was no friend to the Duke (57). He bore this with an unſhaken ſerenity; but when he found not himſelf only but the common cauſe attacked, though in a very dark and ſiniſter way, in the Houſe of Lords, his patience was ſomewhat moved, and he could not help ſhewing his enemies for once, that however great in the field, or wiſe in the cabinet, he had ſtill the like paſſions with themſelves (58). His ſpeech, however, had a good effect, and prevented that project from taking place, which had done the French King more ſervice than even the cautious conduct of the Duke of Vendoſme in the laſt campaign; I mean the ſcheme for leſſening the army in Flanders on the colour of augmenting that in Spain, where, for reaſons known only to themſelves, the very allies for whom we fought ſeemed not very anxious about our ſucceſs. He gained likewiſe a compleat victory at court, where his antagoniſt was forced to quit the field; but it was in ſuch a manner, and with ſo viſible a reluctance in the Queen, that the Duke, who was a man of the utmoſt penetration, eaſily foreſaw the inconveniencies that were like to follow; to prevent which, his only hopes lay in the ſucceſs of the next campaign; for now, and indeed throughout the war, his perſonal intereſt was bound up in the common cauſe: for he had no enemies but thoſe who were likewiſe no friends to that, and who might have been eaſily reconciled, if his Grace would have detached himſelf from that ſyſtem, which he took to be the only one that could effectually provide for the independency of Europe, the Queen his miſtreſs's ſecurity, and the ſafety and glory of Great-Britain.

Confederates, or detaching any of them from the Grand Alliance, only united them more firmly, by procuring them this deciſive proof, that perſeverance would procure them all that they could deſire (b). The Marſhal Villars commanded the French army, which was very numerous, and in good condition. Lewis XIV. expreſſed his hopes, by ſaying a little before the opening of the campaign, Villars was never beaten (i). Indeed, that General ſeemed very deſirous of preſerving that reputation; for upon his taking the field he entrenched his army at Lens in ſuch a manner, that though the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene were very willing to have come to a battle, they found it not in their power. As their army was conſiderable enough to form a ſiege and to cover it againſt the enemy, that was reſolved upon. M. Villars foreſaw this, and believed that Ypres would be the place, for which reaſon he had taken ſuch a camp as covered it (k). The Duke of Marlborough having ſent his heavy baggage to Liſle, and made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking the enemy, marched in the night towards their camp without ſound of trumpet or beat of drum, and ſuddenly turning off to the left, to the ſurprize of his own troops as much as thoſe of the enemy's, inveſted Tournay on the ſixteenth of June (l). This place was but indifferently provided in reſpect to a garriſon; but Lieutenant-General de Surville, who commanded in the town, was a very able and gallant officer, and M. de Megrigni, Governor of the citadel, was the beſt Engineer in France: beſides, the place was looked upon as one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in the Low-Countries, and the citadel eſteemed the maſter-piece of the officer appointed to defend it (m). The trenches were opened in the night of the twenty-ſeventh, and though Marſhal Villars made ſeveral attempts, either to ſuccour the place, or to raiſe the ſiege, they proved all ineffectual, ſo that on the twentieth of July it was ſurrendered, and the garriſon retired into the citadel (n). Upon this a negotiation was ſet on foot for the ſurrender of that place alſo, with a view only to gain time; in reſentment of which the Duke of Marlborough would grant no other terms, than the garriſon ſurrendering priſoners of war, as they did on the twentieth of Auguſt (o). After this conqueſt the army of the Allies advanced to the enemy's lines, which they abandoned in order to take ſuch a poſt as might prevent the ſiege of Mons, and a very ſtrong camp they took: however, even in that it was reſolved to attack them, and this brought on the famous battle of Blaregnies, Malpalquet, Taniers, or the Wood, which was fought Auguſt 31, 1709, in which the French were clearly defeated, after a moſt bloody and obſtinate engagement, notwithſtanding all the advantages they had from the ſituation of ground, and entrenchments raiſed with incredible labour, diſpoſed with great ſkill, and defended by a numerous artillery, with the loſs of fifteen thouſand men to the enemy, and about eighteen thouſand killed and wounded of the Allies (p). This victory made way for the ſiege of Mons, before which the trenches were opened on the fifteenth of September: the garriſon was but weak, which was the true reaſon the French ran the hazard of a battle to protect it; and the Governor, deſirous of ſaving his garriſon, ſigned an honourable capitulation on the tenth of October following (q); after which the army went into winter quarters, and his Grace of Marlborough, after regulating ſome matters of importance at the Hague, returned to England [T]. The entertainment the Duke met with here at home during the winter did not render it very agreeable to him, and he would very probably have gone abroad earlier if things could have been properly ſettled for that purpoſe, which at laſt they were; and towards the latter end of February his Grace went to the Hague, where he met with Prince Eugene, and ſoon after ſet out with him for the army which aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Tournay (r). The firſt thing done of importance was the entering of the French lines, and this was performed without any loſs. The ſiege of Douay was next reſolved upon,

[T] Returned to England.] Upon the firſt news of the glorious victory gained at Malplaquet, the city of London addreſſed the Queen in terms the moſt expreſſive, the moſt loyal, and the moſt reſpectful, which the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, carried to Windſor, and preſented on the tenth of September (62). The Queen in Council, on the third of October following, ordered a Proclamation for a General Thankſgiving (63). The Duke of Marlborough came to St. James's on the tenth of November; on the fifteenth the Parliament of Great-Britain aſſembled, and, on the very firſt day of their ſitting, appointed a Committee, conſiſting of thirteen of their moſt diſtinguiſhed members, to carry their thanks to the Duke (64). The Lord Chancellor Cowper gave him the thanks of the Houſe of Peers on his firſt coming thither (65). The Addreſſes to the Crown were conceived even in ſtronger terms than formerly; and the Queen, as if ſhe was deſirous of taking any occaſion that preſented itſelf of ſhewing her kindneſs for his Grace, appointed him Lord Lieutenant, and Cuſtos Rotulorum of the county of Oxford (66). In the beginning of the year 1710, the French ſet on foot a new negotiation for a peace, which was commonly diſtinguiſhed by the title of the treaty of Gertrudenburgh. The States-General upon this having ſhewn an inclination to enter into conferences with the French Plenipotentiaries, the Houſe of Commons, being made acquainted with it by Sir Gilbert Heathcoate, immediately framed an Addreſs to the Queen, that ſhe would be pleaſed to ſend the Duke of Marlborough over to the Hague without delay; with which Addreſs the Houſe of Lords having concurred, it was preſented on the eighteenth of February, and immediately complied with (67). But amidſt theſe ſeeming honours, preferments, and favours, the Duke was really chagrined to the laſt degree. He perceived that the French intrigues began to prevail both in England and Holland; the affair of Dr. Sacheverell had thrown the nation into a ferment; and the Queen was not only eſtranged from the Ducheſs of Marlborough, but had taken ſuch a diſlike to her that ſhe very ſeldom appeared at Court (68). The friends of the Duke, therefore, were glad of an opportunity to divert his uneaſineſs, by ſending him abroad again in ſo honourable a manner.

and the place inveſted on the twelfth of April: it was naturally ſtrong, had been fortified with great ſkill, well provided with every thing in the winter, had a garriſon of eight thouſand good troops commanded by the Marquis de Albergotti, an Italian Nobleman of great merit and of long ſervice: there was no place better defended during the war; and yet, notwithſtanding the ſiege was often interrupted by a ſuperior army under the command of Marſhal Villars, the place was forced to ſurrender (s) on the 22d of June 1710, though upon very honourable terms: but an attempt that was concerted for ſurprizing Ypres, during this ſiege, miſcarried. After the ſurrender of Douay, the French army under the command of Marſhal Villars retired within their new lines, and the forces of the Allies, under Prince Eugene, inveſted Bethune on the fourth of July: the place was ſtrong, the garriſon numerous, and the Governor a man of experience and valour, who defended it to the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, and then ſurrendered upon honourable terms (t). The enemy ſtill continuing to decline an engagement, the army of the Allies inveſted Aire and St. Venant in one day. The trenches were opened before the latter on the fifth of September, and though the place was remarkably ſtrong by nature, as lying in the midſt of a moraſs, and for it's ſize defended by a numerous garriſon, yet it ſurrendered on the eighteenth (u). The ſiege of Aire was a work of greater difficulty: the garriſon was commanded by Lieutenant-General Goeſbriant, who had under him a Major-General, ſeven Brigadiers, and a garriſon of at leaſt eight thouſand men: the place was defended with much obſtinacy, and did not ſurrender till the thirtieth of October, and then upon honourable conditions (w). The Confederate army ſoon after going into winter quarters, the Duke and Prince Eugene went together to the Hague, and the former about the middle of December returned to England [U]. An exterior civility, which in the Court language was ſtiled a good underſtanding, being eſtabliſhed between the Duke and the new Miniſtry, and the Queen having written to the States-General in very gracious terms in relation to her confidence in him, he went over ſoon after to the Hague, and there met with Prince Eugene, with whom he went to the army, reſolved to convince all Europe, that no perſonal reſentment ſhould reſtrain him from ſupporting the Common Cauſe, and proſecuting the war with ſucceſs while he continued at the head of the Allies (x). Villars, who had undergone a kind of diſgrace at the latter end of the laſt campaign, for ſpeaking his mind a little too freely of the Ducheſs of Burgundy, was again at the head of the French army, which, by the care he had taken of it, was one of the fineſt that had been ſent into the field during the war, and not at all inferior to that of the Allies. His Grace, from the time that he opened the campaign, propoſed to himſelf getting within the French lines, which Villars had over and over declared to be impenetrable: he propoſed alſo to offer the enemy battle, and if it was found impoſſible to force him to fight, he then reſolved to reduce by ſiege that fortreſs, which would contribute moſt to open a paſſage into France (y). It was with this intention that he attacked and made himſelf maſter of the little poſt of Arleux, marching the Confederate army through the plains of Lens, that if they had any intention of fighting, the enemy might have a fair opportunity of ſhewing it. But finding both ſchemes diſappointed, for Villars would not hazard a battle, nor did the poſſeſſion of Arleux anſwer what was expected from it; one muſt naturally ſuppoſe that this ſtrongly affected the Duke's mind, who knew that the eyes of the whole world were upon him, and that a diſappointment would tarniſh all the glory he had acquired: he made therefore a great effort, and ſince Villars would not run the riſk of being beaten in the field, he contrived to beat him in his own way, by ſtratagem: in other campaigns he had excelled all other Generals, but foreſeeing it would be his laſt, in this he excelled himſelf (z). He made ſuch a diſpoſition

of his troops that Arleux was attacked; but he took care to ſupport that poſt in ſuch a manner that the French were repulſed. He made another motion by which it was again expoſed, and ſix hundred men only left to defend it: it was then attacked by Marſhal Monteſquiou at the head of a whole army, and before the great detachment the Duke ſent to ſave it could come up, was taken. His Grace ſeemed then to abandon his deſign, and moved ſtill farther; and, at laſt, as if he was grown impatient, he ordered faſcines to be cut, went himſelf with all the General Officers to view the enemy's diſpoſitions, and made his own in ſuch a manner, that there was not a man in his army who did not expect a battle the next morning: but at the cloſe of the evening on the twenty-fourth of July, he marched off without beat of drum or ſound of trumpet, having ordered Lieutenant-General Cadogan, and Count Hompeſch, to paſs the Senſett at Arleux, with twenty-three battalions and ſeventeen ſquadrons, which were ſo placed as that they were able to aſſemble them in a little time; for his Grace foreſaw they would find that place ſlighted, and no troops near enough to oppoſe them, which indeed happened; for Marſhal Villars recalled all his detachments, from an apprehenſion of being attacked in his camp as at Malplaquet (a). But as ſoon as he was informed of the march of the Confederates, he perceived the deceit, and taking a ſhorter rout to Arleux with his horſe and dragoons, arrived within ſight of the Senſett, as the Duke of Marlborough in perſon, and the cavalry of his left wing, joined the troops under General Cadogan, and advanced in order to attack him (b). Aſhamed of being out-done in that point of conduct which he beſt underſtood, the Marſhal gave out that he would fight the next day; but he was wiſer; and the Duke of Marlborough, who in the beginning of the war had been ſo often hindered from fighting by the Dutch Deputies, now declined fighting when they preſſed him to it, becauſe the troops were exceſſively fatigued with marching all night, becauſe, if any accident happened, their being within the enemy's lines might have been fatal (c): he reſolved, therefore, to beſiege Bouchain, contrary to the ſentiments of all that were about him, who thought it impoſſible that he ſhould take a fortreſs, ſtrong by ſituation, well garriſoned as well as excellently fortified, and with which it was hardly poſſible to cut off the enemy's communication. The Duke, however, was determined, and the place was inveſted on the firſt of Auguſt (d). This ſiege was apparently a trial of ſkill between the two Generals, and it muſt be allowed that Marſhal Villars gave the cleareſt proofs of his capacity in the courſe of it; but the bravery of the troops of the Allies, animated by the preſence of the Duke, who was every where in perſon, carried all before them, and, contrary to the expectation both of friends and enemies, the place was ſurrendered on the ſeventeenth of September, and that too upon the worſt terms poſſible, for the Duke would grant no other (e). After this the army ſeparated, though the Duke would willingly have beſieged Queſnoy, to which the Dutch refuſed their conſent (f). On his return to the Hague he was received with the higheſt marks of reſpect poſſible, and having adjuſted all things with the States, he embarked for England, and came to London on the eighteenth of November [W]. As his Grace had always declared, that no ill uſage that he met with from his enemies ſhould drive him to revenge himſelf on his country, or on the Common Cauſe, by reſigning his commiſſion; ſo thoſe who were reſolved that he ſhould keep it no longer, found themſelves under a neceſſity of engaging the Queen to take it from him: this neceſſity chiefly aroſe from Prince Eugene's being expected to come over with a commiſſion from the Emperor; and to give ſome kind of colour for it, an enquiry was promoted in the Houſe of Commons to fix a very high imputation upon the Duke, as if he had put very large ſums of publick money into his own pocket. When a queſtion to this purpoſe had been carried, the Queen, by a letter conceived in very obſcure terms, acquainted him with her having no farther occaſion for his ſervice, and diſmiſſed him from all his employments, to which he returned a dutiful and ſubmiſſive anſwer (g). He was from this time expoſed to the moſt painful perſecution that a great and good man could endure. On the one hand he ſtood expoſed to the clamour of the populace, and to the outrages of thoſe licentious pens, which are ever ready to eſpouſe [W] He embarked for England, and came to London on the 18*th of November.*] Upon his Grace's return to England, he acted with all the caution imaginable; for happening to land the very night of Queen Elizabeth's inauguration, when great rejoicings were intended by the populace, he continued very prudently at Greenwich, and the next day waited upon the Queen at Hampton-Court, who received him graciouſly (75). He was viſited by the Miniſters, and viſited them; but he did not go to Council, becauſe a negotiation for peace was then on the carpet, upon a baſis which he did by no means approve. He acquainted her Majeſty in the audience he had at his arrival, that as he could not concur in the meaſures of thoſe who directed her councils, he would not diſtract them by a fruitleſs oppoſition (76). Yet finding himſelf attacked in the Houſe of Lords, and loaded with the imputation of having protracted the war, he vindicated his conduct and his character, with great dignity and ſpirit; and in a moſt pathetic ſpeech, appealed to the Queen his Miſtreſs, who was there incognito, for the falſhood of that imputation; declaring, that he was as much for a peace as any man, provided it was ſuch a peace as might be expected from a war undertaken on ſo juſt motives, and carried on with continual ſucceſs (77). This had a very great effect on that moſt auguſt aſſembly, and perhaps made ſome impreſſion on the Queen; but at the ſame time it gave ſuch an edge to the reſentment of his enemies, who were then poſſeſſed of power, that they reſolved to remove him, and to be rid of him, which was ſoon after put in execution (78).

the quarrels of a Miniſtry, and to inſult without mercy whatever characters they know they may inſult with impunity: on the other hand, a proſecution was commenced againſt him by the Attorney-General, for applying publick money to his private uſe, and the workmen employed in building Blenheim-houſe, though ſet at work by the Crown, were encouraged to ſue his Grace for the money that was due to them: all his actions alſo were ſcandalouſly miſrepreſented (h). Theſe uneaſineſſes, added to his grief for the death of the Earl of Godolphin, induced his Grace to gratify his enemies by going into a voluntary exile, and accordingly he embarked at Dover, Nov. 14, 1712, and landing at Oſtend, went from thence to Antwerp, and ſo to Aix la Chapelle, being every where received with the honours due to his high rank, and with the applauſe juſtly paid to his merit (i). At home, as if their end had been anſwered, thoſe proſecutions were ſuſpended, which were as ſcandalous in their nature, as they were falſe and groundleſs in point of fact (k). The Ducheſs of Marlborough alſo, as ſhe ſhared the glory, took likewiſe her part in her Lord's diſgrace, and attended him in all his journies, and particularly in his viſit to the principality of Mindelheim, that was given him by the Emperor, and exchanged for another at the peace which was made while the Duke was abroad; though all the advantages that were derived from it, as well as many more that might have been derived from it, were the fruits of his victories. The concluſion of that peace was ſo far from reſtoring harmony amongſt the ſeveral parties in Great-Britain, that it widened their differences exceedingly; inſomuch that the Chiefs, deſpairing of ſafety in the way they were in, began to think of a retreat, and are ſaid to have ſecretly invited the Duke of Marlborough back to England. However that matter may be, it is very certain that he took a reſolution of returning a little before the Queen's death, and, landing at Dover, came to London Auguſt 4, 1714 (l). His Grace was received with the utmoſt joy and reſpect poſſible, by thoſe who, upon the demiſe of the Queen, were entruſted with the government; and upon the arrival of his late Majeſty King George I. the Duke was particularly diſtinguiſhed by the moſt remarkable acts of royal favour; for he was again declared Captain-General, and Commander in Chief, of all his Majeſty's land forces, Colonel of the firſt regiment of foot guards, and Maſter of the Ordnance (m). His advice was of great uſe in concerting thoſe meaſures by which the rebellion was defeated; and it has been particularly remarked, that the Duke had the ſagacity to foreſee that raſh attempt would be cruſhed at Preſton. The advice he gave upon this occaſion was his laſt effort in reſpect to publick affairs (n); for his infirmities increaſing with his years, he retired from buſineſs, and ſpent the greateſt part of his time, during the remainder of his life, at one or other of his houſes in the country. His death happened June 16, 1722, in his ſeventy-third year (o), at Windſor-lodge, leaving behind him a very numerous poſterity, allied to the nobleſt and greateſt families in theſe kingdoms [X]. Upon his demiſe all parties united in doing honour or rather juſtice to his merit, and his corpſe was interred the ninth of Auguſt following, with all the ſolemnity due to a perſon who had deſerved ſo highly of his country, in Weſtminſter-Abbey (p). The noble pile near Woodſtock, which bears the name of Blenheim-houſe, may be juſtly ſtiled his monument: but without pretending to the gift of prophecy one may venture to foretel, that his glory will long ſurvive that ſtructure; and that ſo long as our Hiſtories remain, or indeed the Hiſtories of Europe, his memory will live and be the boaſt of Britain, who by his labours was raiſed to be the firſt of nations, as during the age in which he lived he was deſervedly eſteemed the firſt of men [Y]. [X] Leaving behind him a very numerous poſterity, allied to the nobleſt and greateſt families in theſe kingdoms.] His Grace had four daughters, upon whom in ſucceſſion his honours were entailed; firſt in the male, and failing that, in the female line. Firſt, Henrietta, born July 19, 1682, married in 1698, to the late Earl of Godolphin: ſhe had the title of the junior Ducheſs of Marlborough, and died in 1733. Her Grace had iſſue William, Marquis of Blandford, who was born in February 1699, and died without iſſue in 1731; Henrietta, born April 12, 1701, married to his Grace the late Duke of Newcaſtle, by whom he had no children; and Mary, who married June 26, 1740, his Grace the preſent Duke of Leeds. His Grace's ſecond daughter Anne, married Charles Earl of Sunderland, by whom ſhe had Robert Earl of Sunderland, who died in 1729; Charles, born November 22, 1706, who, on the demiſe of his brother, became Earl of Sunderland; and on the death of the Marquis of Blandford, ſucceeded him in title and eſtate, as he did to all the honours of this entail upon the demiſe of Henrietta, Ducheſs of Marlborough. His Grace married Elizabeth, daughter to Thomas Lord Trevor, and after his deceaſe was ſucceeded by the preſent Duke of Marlborough. John, the ſecond ſon of Charles Earl of Sunderland, married the third daughter of John Lord Carteret, by whom he left iſſue. Charles Earl of Sunderland left alſo two daughters; Anne, married to the late Lord Viſcount Bateman, of the kingdom of Ireland; and Diana, late Ducheſs of Bedford, who died without iſſue. The third daughter of the great Duke of Marlborough, Elizabeth, born in 1687, married Scroop, firſt Duke of Bridgwater, by whom ſhe had two ſons that died young, and a daughter Anne, married firſt to Wriotheſeley, third Duke of Bedford, and afterwards the wife of William Earl of Jerſey. Her Grace the Ducheſs of Bridgwater died March 22, 1713-14. His Grace's youngeſt daughter, Mary, was born in 1689, and married the late Duke of Montague, by whom ſhe had two ſons, who died young, and two daughters ſtill living; Iſabella, who married William the ſecond Duke of Mancheſter, by whom ſhe had no iſſue, and ſince the wife of Mr. Huſſey, by whom ſhe had iſſue; Mary, married to George Earl of Cardigan, now Duke of Montague (79).

[Y] Firſt of men.] He was, in his private life, remarkable for an eaſineſs of behaviour, which gave an inimitable propriety to every thing he ſaid and did; a calmneſs of temper no accident could move; a temperance in all things, which neither a court life, or court favours, could corrupt; a great tenderneſs for his family, a moſt ſincere attachment to his friends, and a ſtrong ſenſe of religion, without any tincture of bigotry. He was the moſt accompliſhed Courtier of his time, diſtinguiſhed by the favour of five Princes at home, and by particular marks of reſpect from the greateſt Princes abroad; more eſpecially thoſe two great rivals for fame, Charles XII. and Peter the Great, who ſent a Captain of his guards expreſs, to carry the Duke the news of his victory at Pultowa. He was an able Stateſman, as appears from his ſucceſs in many negotiations; a ſtrong and clear ſpeaker, and one who, from the pathetic manner of his delivery, never failed to move the paſſions of others, as it did his own. He was a conſummate General, for he gained every battle he fought, took every town he beſieged, and had the better of all the great Generals that were employed againſt him. But, above all, he was a true Patriot, and followed what he took to be the intereſt of this nation at home and abroad, without reſpect of perſons or of conſequences. In fine, he was equally amiable and great; and if he had foibles, as theſe are inſeparable from human nature, they were ſo hidden by the glare of his virtues, that they were ſcarcely perceived in his own time; and one has reaſon to hope, that envy will hardly find a ſecretary, capable of tranſmitting them to poſterity.

 [Upon the whole, we cannot avoid expreſſing our agreement with the encomium paſſed on the Duke of Marlborough, at the concluſion of our learned predeceſſor's article. The Duke was indeed a moſt illuſtrious man; and his abilities, military and political, will tranſmit his name with eminent renown to poſterity. But our admiration of him is not to preclude any farther enquiries into his character, or to prevent our ſtating what is recorded of him with an appearance of authority, even though it ſhould be ſomewhat to his diſadvantage. In doing this we ſhall not pay a regard to every ebullition of party prejudice, but recite ſuch hiſtorical circumſtances as ſeem to be of too much conſequence to be overlooked. With reſpect to the validity and weight of evidence, our readers will judge for themſelves.

Mrs. Macaulay Graham hath made a ſevere reflection on Lord Churchill's reaſon for deſerting King James to go over to the Prince of Orange. She obſerves, that his Lordſhip "left an apology for his "conduct, in which he pleaded that attachment to "religious principle was the ſole motive by which he "had been induced to violate the laws of gratitude: "and to oppoſe the force of perſonal attachment, he "promiſed warmly to preſerve his duty to the rights "of the King: yet, by ſaying that he could not ex-"pect ſo great favours under any other government, "he ſeemed to acknowledge that another govern-"ment than the King's was in proſpect.

"As Lord Churchill," continues our celebrated female hiſtorian, "had been raiſed from the rank of "a Page to the degree of a Viſcount; had been in-"veſted with a high command in the army; and had "owed a large fortune to the King's bounty, his de-"ſerting his patron in ſuch a critical ſtate of his "affairs, has been cenſured as an act of the moſt "flagitious kind. Burnet takes great care to excul-"pate him from the charges of treachery and ingra-"titude, and aſcribes his conduct to the mere im-"pulſe of religious principle; which unfortunately "does not appear to have highly actuated the gene-"ral tenor of his conduct. It is obſervable, that "Churchill, in his apology, has made no mention of "the duties of a good citizen, or that inviolable at-"tachment to the laws and liberties of one's coun-"try, which, in every judicious mind, will be found "inſeparable from the obligations of religion. But "theſe are ſentiments which indeed are little to be "expected in a courtier, in times when the church "had been ſo ſucceſsful in eradicating every rational "idea of religion and morality from the minds of "men: yet it would have been a fortunate circum-"ſtance towards a favourable illuſtration of Lord "Churchill's conduct, if he had not voluntarily ab-"ſented himſelf at the time of the Queen's deli-"very; if he had not made a merit with William of "carrying over the Princeſs Anne and her huſband; "if he had not prompted this Princeſs to an act of "unneceſſary cruelty to an indulgent father; and, "laſtly, if his having been treated with neglect by "his new maſter had not occaſioned him to conſider "his former conduct in ſuch a very different light "from what he repreſents it in his apology, as to "aſk pardon for it to James, and to avail himſelf "again of the aſcendancy he had gained over the "Princeſs Anne, by engaging her, who was irri-"tated by ſimilar provocations, to join in the ſame "ſtrain of penitence (80)."

(80) Hiſtory of England, vol. viii. p. 245—247.

Not adverting, at preſent, to the facts mentioned in the latter part of this paſſage, which ſufficiently diſplays Mrs. Macaulay Graham's unfavourable diſpoſition to the memory of Lord Churchill, and ſome of which are taken from Mr. Macpherſon's Hiſtory and original Papers, we ſhall offer a remark or two concerning her inſinuation againſt his Lordſhip's being actuated by a religious motive, in his deſertion of King James. It is, indeed, probable, that he might not act upon ſufficiently large grounds with reſpect to public liberty; but there is no reaſon to call in queſtion the ſincerity of his attachment to the Proteſtant religion. His attachment to it might be very great, even if it be true, as Mrs. Graham aſſerts, that religious principle does not appear highly to have actuated the general tenor of his conduct. Many who do not fully conform to the obligations of piety and virtue, may have an ardent zeal for the ſupport of particular ſyſtems of doctrine and worſhip: and this was eminently the caſe in the laſt century, when the diſputes between the Proteſtants and the Papiſts were carried on with the utmoſt warmth, and when the return of Popery was juſtly dreaded as the heavieſt of national calamities. We may add, that the re-eſtabliſhment of ſo abſurd and antichriſtian a ſcheme will always be regarded with deteſtation, by every enlightened friend to the happineſs of mankind. It requires but little knowledge of the world to diſcover, that, though a perſon may not be ſtrictly virtuous in every part of his life, he may, from the conviction of his underſtanding, from the influence of education, from the feelings of humanity, from the love of his country, and even from a ſenſe of duty, vigorouſly oppoſe the deſtruction of the Proteſtant religion. Lord Churchill's ſincerity in this reſpect is ſupported by the additional evidence of two of his letters, which have been preſerved by Sir John Dalrymple. On the 4th of Auguſt, 1688, his Lordſhip wrote to the Prince of Orange, in the following terms:

"Sir, Mr. Sidney will let you know how I intend "to behave myſelf: I think it is what I owe to God "and my country. My honour I take leave to put "into your Royal Highneſs's hands, in which I "think it ſafe. If you think there is any thing elſe "that I ought to do, you have but to command me, "and I ſhall pay an entire obedience to it, being "reſolved to die in that religion that it has pleaſed "God to give you both the will and power to pro-"teſt (81)." In a letter which he addreſſed to the Prince nearly a year before, he had expreſſed himſelf in language equally ſtrong. He declared, in this letter, that his places and the King's favour he ſet at naught, in compariſon of the being true to his religion; that in all things but this the King might command him; and he calls God to witneſs, that even with joy he ſhould expoſe his life for his ſervice, ſo ſenſible he was of his favours; but he adds, that he was reſolved, although he could not live the life of a Saint, if ever there was occaſion for it, to ſhew the reſolution of a Martyr (82). Sir John Dalrymple has printed five more letters, written by Lord Churchill, when become Earl of Marlborough, to King William the Third, but they do not contain any thing which is peculiarly worthy of being noticed (83).

The diſgrace of the Earl of Marlborough in 1692, and his commitment to the Tower, have always been eſteemed among the extraordinary events of his life; and the cauſes of them have not been ſufficiently explained by the generality of hiſtorians. If full credit is to be given to Mr. Macpherſon's account of his Lordſhip's conduct, the affair can no longer be regarded as a ſecret. The narration is too intereſting to be omitted. "The Earl of Marlborough and the Lord "Godolphin were among the firſt who offered their "ſervices for the reſtoration of a Prince whom they "contributed to expel from his kingdom. The late "King doubted their profeſſions of affection for his "perſon; but he aſcribed their conduct to their "prudence. 'The repentance of Churchill,' ſays "James

" long ſince,' ſhe ſaid, ' redeemed my fault. My " mind, however, would have been greatly relieved,
" had I found more early means to communicate my " repenting thoughts. But I hope they will derive

" deſirous to make them, in a free, diſintereſted ac" knowledgment of my fault, for no other end but
" to deſerve and receive the pardon of an injured
" father. I could wiſh that one compliment ſhould
" be made in my name. But the expreſſions moſt
" proper for me would be leaſt convenient for a let" ter. I muſt leave it to the bearer to expreſs my
" reſpect for the Queen (85)."

(85) Macpherſon's Hiſtory of Great-Britain, vol. i. p. 680—682.

The authority on which this account of the Earl of Marlborough's conduct is founded, is that of King James the Second, in his own life, written by himſelf, and which is prefixed to the firſt volume of Mr. Macpherſon's original Papers. The letters mentioned to have been written by the Earl to the exiled monarch, are not inſerted; ſo that the truth of the narration principally depends upon the veracity of thoſe by whom it was communicated to James. There is, however, the leſs reaſon to diſpute their veracity, as the Princeſs of Denmark's letter to her father is given in her own words (86).

(86) Macpherſon's original Papers, vol. i. p. 236—238. 241—242.

A farther, and ſtill more diſhonourable proof of the Earl of Marlborough's attachment to the cauſe of his late royal Maſter, is exhibited in the collections of the hiſtorian already quoted. We there find that the Earl revealed to James a deſign which King William's adminiſtration had formed, in 1694, of attacking the harbour of Breſt, and of deſtroying the French ſhips of war in that harbour. The letter he is ſaid to have written upon this occaſion, was as follows: " It is only to-day I have learned the news I " now write to you; which is, that the bomb-
" ketches, and the twelve regiments encamped at
" Portſmouth, with the two regiments of marines,
" all commanded by Talmaſh, are deſtined for burn" ing the harbour of Breſt, and deſtroying all the " men of war, which are there. This will be a " great advantage to England. But no conſideration " can prevent, or ever ſhall prevent me, from inform" ing you of all that I believe to be for your ſervice.
" Therefore you may make your own uſe of this " intelligence, which you may depend upon being " exactly true. But I muſt conjure you, for your " own intereſt, to let no one know it but the Queen,
" and the bearer of this letter.

" Ruſſell ſails tomorrow, with forty ſhips, the reſt
" being not yet paid; but it is ſaid, that in ten days
" the reſt of the fleet will follow; and, at the ſame
" time, the land forces. I have endeavoured to " learn this ſome time ago from Admiral Ruſſell.
" But he always denied it to me, though I am very " ſure, that he knew the deſign for more than ſix " weeks. This gives me a bad ſign of this man's " intentions. I ſhall be very well pleaſed to learn,
" that this letter comes ſafe to your hands (87)." (87) Ibid. p. 487.

If the above letter, which is extracted from Nairn's Papers, be authentic, and we know not of any ſufficient reaſons for determining againſt its authenticity, it reflects great diſgrace on the memory of the Earl of Marlborough. It was an act of treachery to his country, which no attachment to James, no ill uſage he might think that he had received from King William, could juſtify. To whatever cauſes it was owing, the enterprize againſt Breſt was defeated.

The Duke of Marlborough's intrigues, in general, with the Stuart family, make no ſmall figure in Mr. Macpherſon's Collection of State Papers. The repreſentation which that gentleman hath given of them, in his Hiſtory of Great-Britain, is to the following purpoſe. Mr. Macpherſon, ſpeaking of the Duke's conduct in 1702, obſerves, that, though he " had been raiſed by King William, in the preceding " year, to the command of the Britiſh troops in " Flanders, he liſtened, after the death of James the " Second, to the ſolicitations made in favour of the " ſon of that unfortunate Prince. A kind of prin" ciple, in favour of the family of Stuart, had been " mixed with this nobleman's averſion to William;
" and there is ſcarcely any doubt, that had their " reſtoration to the throne ſuited equally with his " own private intereſt, but he would have preferred
" them to any other race of ſovereigns (88)." The Duke's intrigues with the Pretender's agents, in the year 1704, are thus repreſented: " The Whigs, de-
" ſpairing of any ſucceſs from an oppoſition to " Marlborough, ſeem, at this time, to have formed
" deſigns of inducing him to embark in their own
" cauſe. They had long obſerved, that neither the " Duke nor the Lord Treaſurer had ever yet, even
" in appearance, renounced the pretenſions of the " Prince of Wales. Their object, therefore, was " to gain the Duke to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, by " a marriage between his daughter and the Electoral " Prince. But this, with other ſchemes of the like " kind, were dropt as difficult and uncertain. The " truth is, that though Marlborough and Godolphin
" had not lately appeared warm in the cauſe of the " excluded family, they ſtill maintained a ſecret
" connection, and encouraged private interviews " with the agents of the court of St. Germains.
" The Duke, though, perhaps, not ſo ſincere in his " profeſſions as the Treaſurer, was leſs guarded in " his conduct. In the month of April, when he was " preparing to break the power of the French in " Germany, he regretted the abſence of his nephew,
" the Duke of Berwick, in Portugal; as he ought " to be nearer Britain, to take advantage of ſuch
" events as might ariſe in favour of the exiled Prince.

(88) Hiſtory of Great-Britain, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 232, 233.

" He

" He gave, at the ſame time, the moſt ſolemn aſ-
" ſurances of his unalterable fidelity and attachment
" to the excluded family; and directed their agents
" to apply to the Lord Godolphin, upon any emer" gency that might ariſe during his own abſence in (89) Ibid. p. 302, 303. " the campaign (89)." The account of his Grace's conduct, at the beginning of the year 1705, is to the like purport. " While the Duke of Marlborough
" was thus publicly gratified by the two parties, and " favoured by the Whigs, he continued to make ſe-
" cret profeſſions and proteſtations of zeal for the in-" tereſts of the excluded family. A few days after " his arrival from Holland, he invited himſelf to " ſupper with the Ducheſs of Tyrconnel, who hap" pened to be then in London. Her attachment to " the court of St. Germains, and her knowledge " of the Duke's connexions with the ſervants of the " Prince of Wales, encouraged her to remind him
" of his former promiſes, and to ſuggeſt her expec" tations from his future ſervices. He anſwered her " in general terms. But when ſhe urged him to " agree to particulars, he ſolemnly aſſured her, that " without deſcending to circumſtances, or fixing the " time, he would do every thing which honour and (90) Ibid. p. 315. " juſtice demanded at his hands (90)." We ſhall tranſcribe one more paſſage, belonging to the year 1707, concerning this not very pleaſing ſubject.
" Godolphin—and the Duke of Marlborough con" tinued to make their uſual aſſurances of fidelity
" and attachment to the court of St. Germains.
" The Duke, in particular, ſeemed to inſinuate to " their agents, that one cauſe of rejecting the pro-
" poſals of peace offered by France, was their not " comprehending any ſtipulations in favour of the " exiled family. The conduct of Marlborough, with " regard to that unfortunate race is unaccountable, " except on the footing of principle. Neglected by " the French, and without reſources themſelves, they " were ſcarcely worthy of being deceived, ſhould
" they even have the weakneſs to place any confi" dence in promiſes ſo often and ſo ineffectually
" made. Had their conviction of Marlborough's
" ſincerity been equal to the opinion which the world
" had formed of his power, they might, at leaſt,
" ſuppoſe, that their own misfortunes were drawing
" to an end. The Queen was in poſſeſſion of his " Ducheſs. The affairs of the nation were either " in the hands of his friends, or in his own. The " Lord Treaſurer, who guided the whole line of in" ternal buſineſs, was inſeparably connected with the " fortunes of his family. The Earl of Sunderland,
" his ſon-in-law, as Secretary of State, was poſſeſſed
" of the ſecrets of the kingdom; and either the " ſplendour of his own actions, or the art of his " conduct, had rendered Parliament, in a manner,
(91) Ibid. p. 378. " ſubſervient to his views (91)."

The authorities on which the preceding paſſages, (92) Ibid. p. 453, 454. 502—504. 623. and others of a like nature (92), in Mr. Macpherſon's Hiſtory, are founded, may be ſeen, at large, in the Stuart Papers publiſhed by that gentleman. If full credit is to be given to theſe papers, it is evident that the Duke of Marlborough made, from time to time, great profeſſions of attachment to the cauſe of the Pretender. After examining the documents with attention, it appears to us that the language uſed by the Duke was often little more than complimental, and that the zeal of the agents for the exiled family ſometimes induced them to put as ſtrong a ſenſe as poſſible, upon any expreſſions of his Grace which were favourable to that family. Nevertheleſs, they were not ſo far deceived, but that they frequently intimated their diſtruſt of his ſincerity. On the whole, it ſeems to be clearly proved, that the Duke of Marlborough was deſirous of keeping upon good terms with the houſe of Stuart. To this he might partly be led, as Mr. Macpherſon obſerves, by principle; having been educated in the higheſt ſentiments of loyalty and prerogative, and having received the greateſt perſonal obligations from King James the Second. There is, indeed, nothing unreaſonable in ſuppoſing, that the Duke, though he had ſupported the Revolution from a zeal for the Proteſtant religion and from other conſiderations, might ſtill retain an affection for the family of the excluded monarch. Beſides this, the regard which he always maintained for his own ſafety and intereſt, will farther account for the attention he paid to the court of St. Germains. Almoſt equally balanced as political parties at that time were, it was difficult to judge, whether the houſe of Stuart or the houſe of Hanover would finally prevail. In ſuch a ſituation, and conſidering the nature of mankind, it is not very ſurprizing, that many public men, from a deſire of being ſecure, whatever event took place, ſhould fall into a duplicity of conduct. This we do not ſay with a view to vindicate, or even to apologize for ſuch a conduct, but to ſtate and explain an evident matter of fact.

There is a paſſage in the Marquis of Torcy's Memoirs, which remarkably accords with the account Mr. Macpherſon has given, under the year 1709, of a correſpondence carried on by the Duke of Marlborough with his nephew, the Duke of Berwick. The paſſage we mean, is in a letter to the French King, written from the Hague, on the 22d of May, in the year juſt mentioned. " I have the honour of ac-
" quainting you, ſays Torcy, that, as ſoon as the " Duke of Marlborough arrived, I deſired M. Pet-
" tekum to aſk him when I might wait on him.
" After he had conſulted the Penſionary, and made " a number of excuſes and compliments, for the li" berty he took in appointing me an hour, and not " paying the firſt viſit, I went to him after dinner.
" Were I to relate all the proteſtations he made, of " his profound reſpect and attachment to your Ma-
" jeſty, and of the deſire he has of one day meriting
" your protection, I ſhould fill my letter with things
" leſs eſſential, than thoſe I am going to mention.
" His ſpeeches are florid. I obſerved in what he " ſaid to me a great deal of art, in naming the " Duke of Berwick, and the Marquis of Alegre. I " availed myſelf, Sir, of this circumſtance, to make " him ſenſible, in the courſe of our converſation,
" that I was not ignorant of the particulars of their
" correſpondence with him, and that your ſentiments
" were not changed. He bluſhed, and proceeded " to the propoſals of peace.—Lord Marlborough told " me that we ſhould enter into farther particulars
" with Townſhend, in regard to the affair of New" foundland. He added, that this ſame Lord had " orders concerning the King of England, whom he
" ſtiled the Prince of Wales. He expreſſed a ſtrong
" deſire of being in a capacity to ſerve him, as the " ſon of a King, for whom, he told me afterwards,
" he would have ſpilt the laſt drop of his blood.
" That he believed it was his intereſt to remove out
" of France; and when I aſked him to what country
" he ſhould retire, and in what manner he was to " ſubſiſt, he agreed in reſpect to the firſt article, that
" this Prince ſhould be at liberty to fix his reſidence
" wherever he choſe; ſhould enjoy perfect ſecurity;
" and be his own maſter to go wherever he judged
" proper. The article of his ſubſiſtence met with " greater obſtacles. I propoſed to him the expedient " of the Queen's dowry. He ſaid that the laws of " England, rendered the payment of that ſum ex" tremely difficult: however he begged of me to in-
" ſiſt ſtrenuouſly on this article, when my Lord
" Townſhend and he came to ſpeak to me about it " in the conferences. This Lord, ſaid he, is a kind " of inſpector over me, though he is a very honeſt
" man, who has been choſen through my means, and " of the Whig party. Before him I muſt ſpeak like " an obſtinate Engliſhman; but I wiſh with all my " heart I was able to ſerve the Prince of Wales, and " that your ſolicitations afforded me an opportunity
" of doing it (93)."

(93) Torcy's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 303—305. Engliſh tranſlation.

Whatever may be thought of the expreſſions here made uſe of by the Duke of Marlborough, or of the perſonal regard he might retain for the Stuart family, it is certain, from the whole of the Marquis of Torcy's Memoirs, that his Grace, during the courſe of the negotiations for peace, was never induced to betray the intereſts of his country. Though, from an opinion that was entertained of his avaricious diſpoſition, the Ambaſſadors of the French King were inſtructed to make the Duke the largeſt offers in the way of bribes, he did not accede to them; but ſteadily adhered to the cauſe of the grand confederacy, and ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon thoſe terms of pacification, which were conſidered by the Whigs of that period (whether juſtly or not, we do not now determine) as eſſentially neceſſary to humble the power of France,

to maintain the balance of Europe, and to give ſecurity to the Proteſtant religion.

The Hanover Papers, in Mr. Macpherſon's Collection, contain the Duke of Marlborough's correſpondence with the Electoral Houſe of Brunſwick-Lunenburgh, during the reign of Queen Anne. The letters which paſſed on both ſides are very numerous, and clearly manifeſt the attention that was paid to the Duke by the Hanoverian family. Thoſe which were written by his Grace himſelf, are, for the moſt part, either merely complimental, or give an account of the events of the war, or are in anſwer to the congratulations he had received from the Elector, in conſequence of his various military exploits. In all his letters he expreſſes great reſpect for the houſe of Brunſwick; and ſome of them are worthy of notice, from the high regard he profeſſes for the intereſts of that houſe. One of them, which was addreſſed to the Elector, ſoon after the diſmiſſion of the Earl of Godolphin from the office of Lord Treaſurer, it may not be improper to tranſcribe.

" Sir, Auguſt 30, 1710.

" I am not able to expreſs to your Electoral Highneſs how truly ſenſible I am of the great marks of " confidence which you did me the honour of giving " to me by General Bulaw. I intreat your Highneſs to be perſuaded that I ſhall endeavour to deſerve them, by an inviolable attachment to your " intereſts, with which I conſider thoſe of my country " and of Europe as inſeparably connected. I hope " there will never be found, in England, a conſiderable number of men who can be ſeduced to a " degree capable of ruining it, by allowing themſelves to be impoſed upon by the artifices of Mr. " Harley and others, who conduct themſelves, at " preſent, in a manner to leave it no longer a doubt, " that their views tend to bring back the pretended " Prince of Wales.

" We feel but too much already the effects of their " bad intentions, by the change of my Lord Treaſurer; this ſtep having ruined our credit in the " kingdom; and having loſt us the confidence of our " beſt allies. I deſire, with great impatience, to " converſe with the Baron de Bothmar; and I flatter " myſelf that your Electoral Highneſs does me the " juſtice to believe, that I ſhall act, in all things, after the manner which you will judge moſt conducive to your intereſt. I ſhall give to the Baron " de Bothmar, all the lights and explanations which " I can, to aſſiſt him in the execution of his important commiſſion; in which I ſhall ever co-operate " with him, as ſoon as I ſhall return to England, " whither I ſhall repair, as ſoon as the operations of " the campaign will permit me, with any appearance of decency. I hope to be able there to employ uſefully my attentions, my credit, and my " friends, for advancing the intereſt of your Electoral Highneſs, and of your ſerene family; and " for preventing, at the ſame time, the pernicious " deſigns of thoſe men, who want to eſtabliſh principles, and to form cabals and projects, which will " infallibly overturn the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, and " with it, the ſafety and liberty of their country, " and of all Europe. I am, with a profound re" ſpect, &c. (94)." To the ſame purpoſe, ſeveral other letters, written in the years 1713 and 1714, and equally ſtrong, might be produced; in which the Duke ſpeaks of the meaſures purſued by Queen Anne's Tory miniſtry in the higheſt terms of indignation, propoſes ſuch modes of conduct as he thought would be of advantage to the Hanover family, and declares that he ſhould always be ready to hazard his fortune and his life for their ſervice (95).

(95) Ibid. p. 487, 488. 515—517. 569—571. 625—607. 626.

In the midſt of theſe profeſſions, and whilſt the Duke of Marlborough was abroad in his voluntary exile, it is now generally believed that he entered into a correſpondence with ſome of Queen Anne's Tory miniſtry, and agreed to concur in their meaſures. Mr. Macpherſon repreſents him as having formed an intimate connection with Lord Bolingbroke, and gives the following account of the affair:

" The enmity ſubſiſting between the Treaſurer " and his rival in influence, was greatly fomented by " the uninterrupted connexion between the latter " and the Duke of Marlborough. The Duke, not " remarkable for friendly attachments, ſeemed to " have departed from the uſual indifference of his " character, with regard to the Viſcount Bolingbroke. " He is ſaid to have declared, upon the death of the " Marquis of Blandford, that he had now no comfort " left in the world, except in Henry St. John, whom " he regarded and loved as his own ſon. During " his campaigns abroad, he held an intercourſe, by " letters, with St. John, even when that gentleman " was cloſely connected with Harley, his mortal ene" my. When Harley, through the intrigues of " Mrs. Maſham and the changed opinions of the " nation, brought about a change in the miniſtry, in " 1710, St. John, without breaking with Marlborough, gratified his own ambition, by accepting " the office of Secretary of State. When, therefore, " the Duke was on the worſt terms with the court, he " had a friend in the cabinet, who ſupported his in" tereſt when the current was not too ſtrong to be " ſtemmed. When the dangerous intrigues of Marl" borough, in the end of 1711, furniſhed the Lord " Treaſurer with an opportunity of removing him " from all his employments, St. John yielded to the " times, and approved of a meaſure which he could " not oppoſe.

" The difficult ſituation of the Earl of Oxford, the " perpetual conteſt between his intereſt and princi" ples, his awkward manner, and a conduct through" out undeciſive, ſoon rendered him obnoxious to the " Tories, and hated by the Whigs. He, however, " retained, throughout the year 1712, his influence " with his ſovereign, by finding means to perſuade " that timid Princeſs, that he himſelf was neceſſary " to her ſafety, againſt the dangerous deſigns of the " Whigs. When time had expunged from her me" mory a part of her fears, ſhe began to liſten to the " inſinuations of Bolingbroke againſt the Treaſurer. " Subject to frequent illneſſes, and ſenſible of the " decay of her own conſtitution, ſhe became appre" henſive, that ſhe was faſt approaching to her end. " An enthuſiaſt, like the moſt of her family, ſhe be" came anxious for the eventual ſucceſſion of her " brother to the throne, from motives of religion. " Her ſolemn promiſes to her father, a letter written " to her by that Prince in his laſt illneſs, her having " been, by her deſertion, the obvious cauſe of his " ruin, were always preſent to a mind enfeebled by " ſickneſs, as well as ſuperſtition. She deemed the " death of her children a ſignal puniſhment, inflicted " by Providence for her own injuſtice to a parent, " as ſhe was pleaſed to conſtrue her conduct. Hav" ing left her father in his extremity, with a view " of ſecuring his throne to her own poſterity, ſhe " weakly thought, that heaven had interfered to diſ" appoint her deſigns.

" Bolingbroke had long watched the emotions of " her mind, and he endeavoured to turn them to " his advantage. Having flattered her prejudices, " by pretending to enter into her views, he gradually " ſupplanted the influence of the Lord Treaſurer. " He repreſented the languor of his meaſures. He " gave inſinuations concerning his ſecret intrigues " with the Whigs. The artifice which he uſed with " the Queen, he employed, with equal ſucceſs, on " the more violent Tories. In the beginning of the " preſent year, he formed a ſerious deſign of placing " himſelf at the head of a party, independent of the " Earl of Oxford. But a well-grounded fear of the " Whigs induced him afterwards to adhere to the " Lord Treaſurer. He was, however, at the bottom " of all the mortifications which that miniſter ſuffered, " by the deſertion of ſome of the high-church party " in the laſt ſeſſion of Parliament. To humble his " rival was ſuitable to his violent paſſions. To ruin " him entirely, conſidering the times and his own " precarious ſituation, was inconſiſtent with common " prudence. His object was to ſtrengthen himſelf, " with the return of the Duke of Marlborough. " That nobleman would have no objection to join " with any party, who ſhould contribute to the fall " of his enemy, the Earl of Oxford. To feel the " pulſe of the Tories, and to ſound the inclinations " of the Queen, reports were induſtriouſly ſpread, in " the ſummer, that the Duke was to return to Bri" tain, at the expreſs deſire of the miniſtry.

" These insinuations produced not the expected " effect. The Queen was averse from the measure. " The Tories expressed no desire for the Duke's re- " turn. His Grace, having spent the summer in " making vain solicitations to the house of Hanover " for sending the Electoral Prince to Britain, seemed " to be suddenly seized with an impatience, not un- " natural to his disposition, however much it was " concealed. He represented to the Elector, that, " being now in the sixty-sixth year of his age, he " wished to pass the rest of his life in quietness, in " his native country. That, as his Highness seemed " so indifferent about the succession, it was time for " his friends to take care of themselves. That, by " coinciding with the views of the ministry, whose " almost avowed intentions were to restore the Pre- " tender, the friends of the house of Hanover might, " perhaps, obtain security from a Prince, whose fa- " vour they could not, in reason, expect. These " chidings, bearing the appearance of zeal, were " neither regarded nor feared. In the mean time, " Bolingbroke proceeded in his intrigues. He daily " gained the ground which the unhappy manner of " the Treasurer was destined to lose. He had often " complained to the Queen of his principles. He " now loudly accused him of dilatoriness and indo- " lence. He affirmed, that, by neglecting the power " which the influence of government had placed in " his hands, he had permitted a greater number of " Whigs, than was consistent with the safety of go- " vernment, to obtain seats in the House of Com- " mons.

" Expecting much from the intrigues of Boling- " broke, and tired of his own situation, the Duke " of Marlborough again formed hopes of his speedy " return. To regain his former power, he seemed " inclined to desert his present friends. He was " willing to govern Anne, by yielding to her preju- " dices. Under a certainty that she was attached to " her brother's interest, he endeavoured secretly to " gain the confidence of the Pretender's adherents " abroad. He wrote to the Duchess of Berwick. " He even sent a letter to the late King James's " Queen. He dispatched one of his retainers to " France. He empowered him to convey the most " solemn protestations of his attachment to the Che- " valier de St. George. He assured him, with an " oath, that he would rather cut off his own right- " hand, than oppose his views on the throne. That, " provided he himself might be rendered secure, he " would not hesitate a moment to use all his credit, " both privately and publicly, for his service. He " instructed the Duke of Berwick, he said, more " largely on the subject; and he had reason to hope " an answer suitable to his sincerity and zeal. These " relentings of Marlborough, if they were at all sin- " cere, were prevented from having any effect, by " the fears of the Queen. The dangerous intrigues " of the Duke, in the preceding year, had made such " a deep impression on her mind, that she was even " terrified at the very mention of his name; and " though she could not legally continue his exile, " she resolved never to give her consent to his re- " turn.

" The terrors of the Queen for Marlborough " proved a fatal blow to her own views. To ruin " the Treasurer, by supporting himself with the pre- " judices of the sovereign, the Duke might have " probably deserted the principles of the Whigs; " which, like many of the party, he had only adopted " to favour his own designs. But when he found " that the Queen was obdurate, and that the Pre- " tender himself treated his proposals with caution " and even distrust, he fell back with vehemence " into his former professions to the house of Han- " over (96)."

(96) History of Great-Britain, vol. ii. p. 619—623.

For the authorities on which the preceding extraordinary narration is founded, Mr. Macpherson refers to the Stuart papers of 1713, and he should have added, those of 1714. After having examined these papers, we are clearly of opinion, that they do not fully justify the strong language that historian hath adopted, or prove the connexion between the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Bolingbroke to have been so close and regular as is above represented (97). In the perusal of Mr. Macpherson's History, we have found occasion to observe, that, in several instances, he seems to have built more upon his authorities than the authorities themselves will strictly support; or, at least, that he has bestowed too full a credit on the prejudiced suggestions, and imperfect informations of the agents for the house of Stuart.

(97) Original Papers, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 441, 442. 446. 532. 534.

After the accession of King George the First, when the Earl of Oxford was impeached and committed to the Tower, and preparations were made for his trial, it is well known that a stop was suddenly put to it, to the great disappointment of a large part of the nation. There is a traditional story, relative to this event, in which the Duke of Marlborough is concerned. It is said, that, at that time, Mr. Auditor Harley waited upon the Duchess of Marlborough, and shewed her a letter, formerly written by the Duke, which proved his correspondence with the Pretender. Mr. Harley, after having read the letter, threatened that it should be produced at his brother the Earl of Oxford's trial, unless the proceedings against him were stopped. The Duchess, watching her opportunity, seized the letter out of Mr. Harley's hand, threw it instantly into the fire, and then defied his malice. Upon this he replied, " Madam, I " knew your Grace too well to trust you. The let- " ter you have burnt is only a copy: the original is " safe in my own possession." A similar anecdote, the authority for which we are able to assign, has been communicated to us by a worthy friend (98). Before the Earl of Oxford's intended trial, he sent his son, Lord Harley, together with Serjeant Comyns, (afterwards chief Baron of the Exchequer) to the Duke of Marlborough, requesting his Grace's attendance at the trial. The Duke, in some concern, enquired what the Earl wanted with him. Mr. Serjeant Comyns replied, that it was only to ask his Grace a question or two. The Duke walked about the room for about a quarter of an hour, without giving any answer, and seemed greatly disturbed; after which he asked, for what purpose his attendance was required. Lord Harley told him, it was only as to his hand. " What," says his Grace, " has your fa- " ther any letters of mine?" " Yes," replied Lord Harley, " all the letters your Grace ever wrote to " him since the Revolution." Upon this the Duke continued to walk about the room in the greatest uneasiness, and even flung his wig off, in his passion. Mr. Serjeant Comyns interrogating him what answer they should return to the unfortunate Lord, he said, " I will certainly be there." This was the true reason why the Earl of Oxford was never brought to a trial. The late James West, Esq; Member for St. Alban's, and President of the Royal Society, gave the account of the fact to the late Counsellor Gregg, in whose hand-writing it is now preserved. Mr. West assured Mr. Gregg, that he received it from Serjeant Comyns's own mouth.

We shall insert, in this place, a few miscellaneous anecdotes concerning the Duke of Marlborough, which have been collected by us from different quarters, and may serve to illustrate the disposition of his mind. One of the first things which he did, when very young, was to purchase a box to put his money in; an indication this, of the œconomical, not to say, avaricious temper that accompanied him through life (99). Dr. Joseph Warton relates, that, on the evening of an important battle, the Duke was heard to chide his servant, for having been so extravagant as to light four candles in his tent, when Prince Europe came to confer with him (100). Mr. Tyers, on the other hand, hath mentioned a circumstance to us, which, if well founded, redounds to his Grace's generosity; though in a different respect it is much to his discredit. It is, that, during the Rebellion in 1715, he sent ten thousand pounds to the Earl of Mar. We consider the story as only a traditional report, which has not in itself any great degree of probability; and, therefore, we are by no means convinced of its truth. The late Mr. Richardson, junior, the Painter, hath recorded a pleasing instance of the Duke's calmness of disposition, for which, indeed, he was always remarkable. " The Duke of Marl- " borough," says the writer, " riding out once with " Commissary Marriot, near the Commissary's house " in the country, it began to rain, and the Duke " called for his cloak; Marriot having his put on " by

" by his ſervant immediately. The Duke's ſervant " not bringing the cloak, he called for it again; but " the man was ſtill puzzling about the ſtraps and " buckles. At laſt, it raining now very hard, the " Duke called again, and aſked him, 'what he was " about, that he did not bring his cloak?' 'You " muſt ſtay,' grumbles the fellow, 'if it rains cats " and dogs, till I can get at it.' The Duke only " turned to Marriot, and ſaid, I would not be of that " fellow's temper." The Duke of Marlborough, adds Mr. Richardſon, did, by nature and conſtitution, what Seneca judged, by philoſophy, ought to be done. Quid eſt quare ego ſervi mei hilarius reſponſum, & contumacionem vultum, flagellis & compedibus expiem? (101).

(101) Richardſonia, p. 142. Mr. Richardſon had the ſtory from Counſellor Marriot, ſon of the Commiſſary.

Dr. Swift, in one of his letters to Stella, relates the following particulars concerning the Duke of Marlborough. " I was early this morning with Secretary " St. John, and gave him a memorial to get the " Queen's letter for the firſt-fruits, who has promiſed " to do it in a very few days. He told me, 'he had " been with the Duke of Marlborough, who was la- " menting his former wrong ſteps in joining with " the Whigs, and ſaid he was worn out with age, " fatigue, and misfortunes.' I ſwear it pitied me, " and I really think they will not do well in too " much mortifying that man, although indeed it is " his own fault. He is covetous as hell, and ambi- " tious as the prince of it: he would fain have been " General for life, and has broken all endeavours for " peace, to keep his greatneſs, and get money. He " told the queen, 'he was neither covetous nor am- " bitious.' She ſaid, 'if ſhe could have conveni- " ently turned about, ſhe would have laughed, and " could hardly forbear it in his face.' He fell in " with all the abominable meaſures of the late mi- " niſtry, becauſe they gratified him for their own " deſigns. Yet he has been a ſucceſsful General, " and I hope he will continue his command (102)."

(102) Swift's works, vol. xxii. p. 135, 136. 24mo. edition, of 1775.

Various characters have been drawn of the Duke of Marlborough, moſt of which we ſhall omit, as either already ſufficiently known, or as not meriting particular notice. That which is given of him by Dr. Swift, in his "Hiſtory of the four laſt Years of the Queen," has all the malignity and meanneſs of a party pamphlet (103). It is even ſo fooliſh as to inſinuate, that the Duke's military accompliſhments were problematical, and that he was deſtitute of perſonal courage. Mr. Macpherſon's character of his Grace is very elaborately compoſed, and diſplays no ſmall degree of ability and penetration. We think, however, that it is not entirely free from prejudice. The hiſtorian conſiders it as a fact, that Lord Churchill, at the time of the Revolution, had a deſign of placing his unfortunate maſter, King James the Second, a priſoner in the hands of his rival, the Prince of Orange. But this is a ſtory which we regard as wholly unworthy of credit. It is founded upon ſuggeſtions and informations ſo groundleſs, and even ridiculous, that it cannot deſerve a formal refutation. On the other hand, Mr. Macpherſon has done juſtice to the Duke of Marlborough's proſecution of the war in Flanders, and hath ſhewn that he conducted it upon the principles of ſound wiſdom and good policy (104).

There are two teſtimonies to the honour of the Duke's memory, by two celebrated noble writers, which cannot be paſſed over. One is by Lord Bolingbroke, in his Letters on the Study and Uſe of Hiſtory. Speaking of the conſternation raiſed among the allies of the grand confederacy, by the death of King William, and of the joy which that event gave to the French, his Lordſhip obſerves, that " a ſhort " time ſhewed how vain the fears of ſome, and the " hopes of others were. By his death, the Duke of " Marlborough was raiſed to the head of the army, " and indeed of the confederacy: where he, a new, " a private man, a ſubject, acquired, by merit and " by management, a more deciding influence, than " high birth, confirmed authority, and even the " crown of Great-Britain, had given to King Wil- " liam. Not only all the parts of that vaſt machine, " the grand alliance, were kept more compact and " entire, but a more rapid and vigorous motion was " given to the whole: and, inſtead of languiſhing " out diſaſtrous campaigns, we ſaw every ſcene of " the war full of action. All thoſe wherein he ap- " peared, and many of thoſe wherein he was not " then an actor, but abettor however of their ac- " tion, were crowned with the moſt triumphant ſuc- " ceſs. I take, with pleaſure, this opportunity of " doing juſtice to that great man, whoſe faults I " knew, whoſe virtues I admired; and whoſe me- " mory, as the greateſt General, and as the greateſt " Miniſter, that our country, or perhaps any other " has produced, I honour (105)." *

(105) Letters on the Study and Uſe of Hiſtory, p. 299, 300. Edition of 1779.

* A certain Paraſite, who thought to pleaſe Lord Bolingbroke by ridiculing the avarice of the Duke of Marlborough, was ſtopt ſhort by Lord Bolingbroke; who ſaid, " he was ſo very great a man, that I forget he had that vice."—Warton's Eſſay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, vol. ii. p. 378.

The other teſtimony to the Duke's accompliſhments, is by the Earl of Cheſterfield, in his Letters to his ſon. " Of all the men," ſays his Lordſhip, " that ever I knew in my life, (and I knew him ex- " tremely well) the late Duke of Marlborough poſ- " ſeſſed the graces in the higheſt degree, not to ſay " engroſſed them; and indeed he got the moſt by " them; for I will venture (contrary to the cuſtom " of profound hiſtorians, who always aſſign deep " cauſes for great events) to aſcribe the better half " of the Duke of Marlborough's greatneſs and riches " to thoſe graces. He was eminently illiterate; wrote " bad Engliſh, and ſpelled it ſtill worſe. He had " no ſhare of what is commonly called parts; that is, " he had no brightneſs, nothing ſhining in his ge- " nius. He had, moſt undoubtedly, an excellent " good plain underſtanding, with ſound judgment. " But theſe, alone, would probably have raiſed him " but ſomething higher than they found him; which " was, Page to King James the Second's Queen. " There the graces protected and promoted him; " for, while he was an Enſign of the Guards, the " Ducheſs of Cleveland, then favourite miſtreſs to " King Charles the Second, ſtruck by thoſe very " graces, gave him five thouſand pounds; with which " he immediately bought an annuity for his life; of " five hundred pounds a year, of my grandfather " Halifax; which was the foundation of his ſubſe- " quent fortune. His figure was beautiful; but his " manner was irreſiſtible, by either man or woman. " It was by this engaging, graceful manner, that he " was enabled, during all his war, to connect the " various and jarring powers of the grand alliance, " and to carry them on to the main object of the " war, notwithſtanding their private and ſeparate " views, jealouſies, and wrongheadedneſſes. What- " ever court he went to, (and he was often obliged " to go himſelf to ſome reſty and refractory ones) " he as conſtantly prevailed, and brought them into " his meaſures. The Penſionary Heinſius, a vene- " rable old miniſter, grown grey in buſineſs, and who " had governed the Republic of the United Provinces " for more than forty years, was abſolutely governed " by the Duke of Marlborough, as that Republic " feels to this day. He was always cool; and no- " body ever obſerved the leaſt variation in his coun- " tenance: he could refuſe more gracefully than other " people could grant; and thoſe who went away " from him the moſt diſſatisfied, as to the ſubſtance " of their buſineſs, were yet perſonally charmed with " him, and, in ſome degree, comforted by his man- " ner. With all his gentleneſs and gracefulneſs, no " man living was more conſcious of his ſituation, nor " maintained his dignity better (106)."

(106) Cheſterfield's Letters to his Son, vol. ii. p. 104—106. Seventh edition. Letter 136.

A peruſal of the above paſſage will convince us of the frivolous turn of the Earl of Cheſterfield's mind. His Lordſhip, in his zeal to exalt the Duke of Marlborough's external accompliſhments, either forgets or depreciates the far greater talents of which he was poſſeſſed. There is an obſervation upon the ſubject, in the Britiſh Biography, with which we entirely concur. " That the Duke of Marlborough," ſays the writer, " was eminently diſtinguiſhed by the " gracefulneſs of his manners, cannot be queſtioned: " but the Earl of Cheſterfield appears to have attri- " buted too much to their influence, when he aſ- " cribes—the better half of the Duke of Marlbo- " rough's greatneſs and riches to thoſe graces. That " the uncommon gracefulneſs of his manners faci- " litated his advancement, and contributed to the " ſucceſs of his negociations, may readily be ad- " mitted: but ſurely it muſt have been to much " higher qualities that he owed the eſteem of King " William and of Prince Eugene, his reputation " throughout all Europe, and his many victories " and conqueſts. It was not by a polite exterior that " he

" he obtained his laurels at Schellenberg, at Oude-
" narde, at Ramillies, and at Blenheim (107)."

(107) British Biography, vol. vii. p. 355.

How much the Duke of Marlborough has been celebrated by our poets, is well known by Addiſon's " Campaign," and Philips's " Blenheim." Mr. Addiſon, in his Roſamond, has properly aſſumed another and voluntary occaſion of paying a fine compliment to his Grace's military exploits, and the glory by which they would be followed (108). Upon the Duke's removal from his places, an ode was inſcribed to him, by Mr. Somerville, animated with all the zeal of whiggiſh enthuſiaſm, and containing ſome paſſages that are truly poetical. Another ode, not much inferior in ſpirit, was addreſſed to his Grace, on occaſion of his embarking for Oſtend, in the year 1712 (109).

Though it is not our deſign to enter into a regular account of the Ducheſs of Marlborough, ſhe made, nevertheleſs, ſo diſtinguiſhed a figure, and appears with ſuch eminence in the general hiſtory of the times, that we cannot avoid taking notice of ſome of the deſcriptions and characters which have been given of her by various writers. Colley Cibber's rapturous diſplay of her beauty will be amuſing to the reader. He is deſcribing an entertainment at which he happened to be preſent, in 1688, at Nottingham, when the Princeſs Anne of Denmark retreated thither, accompanied by Lady Churchill. " The noble gueſts " at the table happening to be more in number, than " attendants out of liveries could be found for, I " being well known in the Lord Devonſhire's family, " was deſired by his Lordſhip's Maitre d'Hotel to " aſſiſt at it: the poſt aſſigned me was to obſerve " what the Lady Churchill might call for. Being ſo " near the table, you may naturally aſk me, what I " might have heard to have paſſed in converſation at " it? which I ſhould certainly tell you, had I attended to above two words that were uttered there, " and thoſe were, ſome wine and water. Theſe, I " remember, came diſtinguiſhed, and obſerved to my " ear, becauſe they came from the fair gueſt, whom " I took ſuch pleaſure to wait on. Except at that ſingle ſound, all my ſenſes were collected into my " eyes, which during the whole entertainment wanted " no better amuſement, than of ſtealing now and " then the delight of gazing on the fair object ſo " near me. If ſo clear an emanation of beauty, ſuch " a commanding grace of aſpect ſtruck me into a " regard that had ſomething ſofter than the moſt " profound reſpect in it, I cannot ſee why I may not, " without offence, remember it; ſince beauty, like " the ſun, muſt ſometimes loſe its power to chuſe, " and ſhine into equal warmth, the peaſant and the " courtier. Now to give you, Sir, a farther proof " of how good a taſte my firſt hopeful entrance into " manhood ſet out with, I remember above twenty " years after, when the ſame lady had given the " world four of the lovelieſt daughters that ever were " gaz'd on, even after they were all nobly married, " and were become the reigning toaſts of every party " of pleaſure, their ſtill lovely mother had at the " ſame time her votaries, and her health very often " took the lead, in thoſe involuntary triumphs of " beauty. However preſumptuous, or impertinent " theſe thoughts might have appeared at my firſt " entertaining them, why may I not hope that my " having kept them decently ſecret, for full fifty " years, may be now a good round plea for their " pardon? Were I now qualified to ſay more of this " celebrated lady, I ſhall conclude it thus: that ſhe " has liv'd (to all appearance) a peculiar favourite " of providence; that few examples can parallel the " profuſion of bleſſings which have attended ſo long " a life of felicity: A perſon ſo attractive! a huſband ſo memorably great! an offſpring ſo beautiful! a fortune ſo immenſe! and a title, which " (when royal favour had no higher to beſtow) ſhe " only could receive from the Author of nature; a " great grandmother without grey hairs! Theſe are " ſuch conſummate indulgencies, that we might " think heaven has center'd them all in one perſon, " to let us ſee how far, with a lively underſtanding, " the full poſſeſſion of them could contribute to human happineſs (110)."

The ſhort character given of Lady Churchill by Biſhop Burnet, is much in her praiſe. " She was a " woman," ſays this Prelate, " of little knowledge; " but of a clear apprehenſion, and a true judgment; " a warm and hearty friend, violent and ſudden in " her reſolutions, and impetuous in her way of " ſpeaking. She was thought proud and inſolent " on her favour, though ſhe uſed none of the com- " mon arts of a court to maintain it: for ſhe did " not beſet the Princeſs, nor flatter her. She ſtayed " much at home, and looked very carefully after the " education of her children (111)."

Afterwards, when the Ducheſs of Marlborough had aſſumed an active part in the political events of the times, and the ſpirit of contention ran high, ſhe was not always ſpoken of in favourable terms. Dr. Swift's character of the Ducheſs is drawn up with his uſual malignity. " It is to her," ſays the Dean, " the Duke is chiefly indebted for his greatneſs and " his fall. For above twenty years ſhe poſſeſſed, " without a rival, the favours of the moſt indulgent " miſtreſs in the world, nor ever miſſed one ſingle " opportunity that fell in her way of improving it to " her own advantage. She hath preſerved a tolerable court reputation with reſpect to love and gallantry; but three furies reigned in her breaſt, " the moſt mortal enemies of all ſofter paſſions, which " were, ſordid avarice, diſdainful pride, and ungovernable rage. By the laſt of theſe often breaking out in ſallies of the moſt unpardonable ſort, " ſhe had long alienated her ſovereign's mind, before it appeared to the world. This lady is not " without ſome degree of wit; and hath in her " time affected the character of it, by the uſual method of arguing againſt religion, and proving the " doctrines of chriſtianity to be impoſſible and abſurd. Imagine what ſuch a ſpirit, irritated by the " loſs of power, favour, and employment, is capable " of acting or attempting; and then I have ſaid " enough (112)."

(112) Swift's works, ubi ſupra, vol. xviii. p. 21, 22.

The ſame writer, in a letter to Mrs. Dingley, mentions an inſtance of the Ducheſs's ingratitude to her royal Miſtreſs, which redounds greatly to her diſhonour. " I dined," ſays Dr. Swift, " at the Lord " Treaſurer's, with his Saturday company. We had " ten at table, all Lords but myſelf and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Argyle went off at ſix, " and was in very indifferent humour, as uſual. " Duke of Ormond and Lord Bolingbroke were abſent. I ſtaid till near ten. Lord Treaſurer ſhewed " us a ſmall picture, enamelled work, and ſet in " gold, worth about twenty pounds; a picture, I " mean of the Queen, which ſhe gave to the Ducheſs " of Marlborough, ſet in diamonds. When the " Ducheſs was leaving England, ſhe took off all the " diamonds, and gave the picture to one Mrs. Higgins, (an old intriguing woman, whom every body " knows) bidding her make the beſt of it ſhe could. " Lord Treaſurer ſent to Mrs. Higgins for this picture, and gave her one hundred pounds for it. " Was ever ſuch an ungrateful beaſt as that Ducheſs? " or did you ever hear ſuch a ſtory? I ſuppoſe the " Whigs will not believe it. Pray try them. She " takes off the diamonds, and gives away the picture " to an inſignificant woman, as a thing of no conſequence; and gives it to her to ſell, like a piece " of old-faſhioned plate (113)."

(113) Ibid. vol. xix. p. 305.

In 1742 was publiſhed (114), " An Account of " the Conduct of the Dowager Ducheſs of Marlborough, from her firſt coming to Court, to the Year " 1710. In a Letter from Herſelf to my Lord ——." This work, which is well written in point of compoſition, excited conſiderable attention at the time of its appearance, and gave riſe to many ſtrictures and ſome controverſy. The principal deſign of it is to vindicate the part which the Ducheſs had acted, during the whole of her connexion with Queen Anne, from the beginning of that connexion, in 1683, to its final diſſolution. The eaſe and elegance with which the book is compoſed, the anecdotes it relates, and the original letters it contains, render it by no means an unintereſting performance; and it is not without its uſe in the elucidation of our general hiſtory. Nevertheleſs, from the prejudice and paſſion wherewith the Ducheſs writes, from her ſeverity to her enemies, and from the malignity ſhe diſplays againſt the memories of King William and Queen Mary, ſhe has contrived to make her own character (114) In one volume, 8vo.

ſtand in no higher a degree of eſtimation than that in which it was held before. Mr. Horace Walpole, in reference to the work in queſtion, has drawn the following picture of her grace, in ſtrong, not flattering colours. "It is ſeldom the public receives information on Princes and Favorites from the fountain-head: flattery or invective is apt to pervert the relations of others. It is from their own pens alone, whenever they are ſo gracious, like the Lady in queſtion, as to have a paſſion for fame and approbation, that we learn exactly, how trifling and fooliſh and ridiculous their views and actions were, and how often the miſchief they did proceeded from the moſt inadequate cauſes. We happen to know indeed, though he was no author, that the Duke of Buckingham's repulſes in very impertinent amours, involved King James and King Charles in national quarrels with Spain and France. From her Grace of Marlborough we may collect, that Queen Anne was driven to change her Miniſtry, and in conſequence, the fate of Europe, becauſe ſhe dared to affect one bed-chamber woman, as ſhe had done another. The Ducheſs could not comprehend how the couſins Sarah Jennings and Abigail Hill could ever enter into competition, though the one did but kneel to gather up the clue of favour, which the other had haughtily toſſed away; and which ſhe could not recover by putting The Whole Duty of Man into the Queen's hands to teach her friendſhip.

"This favorite Ducheſs, who, like the proud Duke of Eſpernon, lived to brave the ſucceſſors in a court where ſhe had domineered, wound up her capricious life, where it ſeems ſhe had begun it, with an apology for her conduct. The piece, though weakened by the prudence of thoſe who were to correct it, though maimed by her Grace's own corrections, and though great part of it is rather the annals of a wardrobe than of a reign, yet has ſtill curious anecdotes, and a few of thoſe ſallies of wit which fourſcore years of arrogance could not fail to produce in ſo fantaſtic an underſtanding. And yet by altering her memoirs as often as her will, ſhe diſappointed the public as much as her own family. However, the chief objects remain; and one ſees exactly how Europe and the back ſtairs took their places in her imagination and in her narrative. The Revolution left no impreſſion on her mind but of Queen Mary turning up bed-cloaths: and the Proteſtant Hero, but of a ſelfiſh glutton who devoured a diſh of peas from his ſiſter-in-law. Little circumſtances indeed convey the moſt characteriſtic ideas; but the choice of them may as often paint the genius of the writer, as of the perſon repreſented.

"Mrs. Abigail Hill is not the only perſon tranſmitted to poſterity with marks of the Ducheſs's reſentment. Lord Oxford, Honeſt Jack Hill, the ragged Boy, the Quebec-General, and others make the ſame figure in her hiſtory that they did in her mind.——Sallies of paſſion not to be wondered at in one, who has ſacrificed even the private letters of her miſtreſs and benefactreſs (115)!"

(115) Royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 197—200.

Though the Ducheſs's account of her conduct has ranked her among the noble authors, it may be queſtioned how far ſhe is juſtly entitled to a place in ſo honourable a catalogue. She furniſhed, indeed, the materials for the work, and it was drawn up under her own eye and direction; but the real writer of it was Mr. Hooke, to whom the literary world is indebted for the Roman Hiſtory, the Life of Fenelon, and the tranſlation of the Travels of Cyrus. The Ducheſs of Marlborough rewarded Hooke with five thouſand pounds for his trouble, which muſt be allowed to have been a very liberal gratuity. She was actuated, on this occaſion, by a far more generous ſpirit than that which animated her laſt will, when ſhe bequeathed only five hundred pounds a piece to Mr. Mallet and Mr. Glover, as a premium to be beſtowed upon them, when they ſhould write a hiſtory of the Duke of Marlborough. The Ducheſs had a quarrel with Mr. Hooke, after her employment of him; becauſe, as ſhe affirmed, he endeavoured to convert her to Popery. Hooke, we are told, was a Myſtic, and a Quietiſt, and a warm diſciple of Fenelon (116).

Mr. Pope's character of Atoſſa, which was intended for the Ducheſs of Marlborough, we ſhall inſert in this place.

"But what are theſe to great Atoſſa's mind?
Scarce once herſelf, by turns all womankind!
Who, with herſelf, or others, from her birth
Finds all her life one warfare upon earth:
Shines, in expoſing knaves, and painting fools,
Yet is, whate'er ſhe hates and ridicules.
No thought advances, but her eddy brain
Whiſks it about, and down it goes again.
Full ſixty years the world has been her trade,
The wiſeſt fool much time has ever made.
From loveleſs youth to unreſpected age,
No paſſion gratify'd, except her rage,
So much the fury ſtill out-ran the wit,
The pleaſure miſs'd her, and the ſcandal hit.
Who breaks with her, provokes revenge from hell,
But he's a bolder man who dares be well.
Her ev'ry turn with violence purſu'd,
No more a ſtorm her hate than gratitude:
To that each paſſion turns, or ſoon or late;
Love, if it makes her yield, muſt make her hate:
Superiors? death! and equals? what a curſe!
But an inferior not dependant? worſe.
Offend her, and ſhe knows not to forgive;
Oblige her, and ſhe'll hate you while you live:
But die, and ſhe'll adore you—then the buſt
And temple riſe—then fall again to duſt.
Laſt night, her Lord was all that's good and great;
A knave this morning, and his will a cheat.
Strange! by the means defeated of the ends,
By ſpirit robb'd of power, by warmth of friends,
By wealth of follow'rs! without one diſtreſs
Sick of herſelf, thro' very ſelfiſhneſs!
Atoſſa, curs'd with ev'ry granted pray'r,
Childleſs with all her children, wants an heir.
To heirs unknown deſcends the unguarded ſtore,
Or wanders, heav'n directed, to the poor (117)."

(117) Pope's works, vol. ii. p. 131, 132. Edit. of 1776.

Theſe lines were ſhewn to her Grace, as if they were intended for the portrait of the Ducheſs of Buckingham; but ſhe ſoon ſtopped the perſon that was reading them to her, and called out aloud—"I "cannot be ſo impoſed upon—I ſee plainly enough "for whom they are deſigned;" and abuſed Pope moſt plentifully upon the ſubject; though ſhe was afterwards reconciled to, and courted him (118). The violence of the Ducheſs of Marlborough's temper, which is ſo ſtrongly painted in the character of Atoſſa, frequently broke out into wonderful and ridiculous indecencies. In the laſt illneſs of the Great Duke her huſband, when Dr. Mead left his chamber, the Ducheſs, diſliking his advice, followed him down ſtairs, ſwore at him bitterly, and was going to tear off his perriwig. Dr. Hoadly, the late Biſhop of Wincheſter, was preſent at this ſcene (119).

It is ſaid, that her Grace did not chooſe to have any of her deſcendants called Sarah after her; and that for this reaſon ſhe fixed upon the name of Diana for her grand-daughter, who was afterwards Ducheſs of Bedford (120). Some particulars concerning the Churchill family may be ſeen in Hutchings's Hiſtory and Antiquities of Dorſet. An ingenious and worthy friend (121) hath favoured us with a copy of an inſcription to the memory of General Charles Churchill, fourth ſon of Sir Winſton, and brother to the Duke of Marlborough; but the inſertion of it, on account of the length to which the preſent note has been extended, will probably be excuſed.

 [CHURCHILL (CHARLES),* an eminent ſatiric Poet, was born in Vine-Street, in the pariſh of St. John's, Weſtminſter, in the year 1731. His father, who was a very reſpectable Clergyman, was Curate and Lecturer of the pariſh, and was poſſeſſed, beſides, of a living in the country. Young Charles, as might be expected from the vicinity of his ſituation, received his grammatical education at Weſtminſter ſchool; in which he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo far, as to make his Tutors ſenſible that he was a lad of conſiderable abilities. His application, however, as is too frequently the caſe with youths of lively parts, by no means kept pace with his natural talents; ſo that the chief character he obtained was, that he was a boy who could do well if he would. One day, having been enjoined to make an exerciſe, he failed in bringing it at the time appointed; for which reaſon his maſter not only chaſtiſed him with ſome ſeverity, but even charged him with ſtupidity. The laſt reproach made a ſtrong impreſſion upon Charles Churchill's mind, and the fear of ſhame wrought an effect which the fear of ſtripes could not produce. On the next day, he brought his exerciſe finiſhed in ſuch a manner, that he received the public thanks of the maſters of the ſchool. This inſtance of his ſenſibility, and of the applauſe that reſulted from it, was not followed by a complete reformation of conduct. The vivacity of his imagination, and the diſſipation of his temper, ſtill prevented his walking regularly forward in the trammels of a ſcholaſtic education. When, therefore, he was ſent by his father to the Univerſity of Oxford, he was refuſed an admittance into that illuſtrious ſeat of literature, upon account of his want of a proper ſkill in the learned languages. This, no doubt, was a great mortification to himſelf, as well as a ſevere diſappointment to a worthy parent. Churchill, in the ſubſequent parts of his life, often mentioned his repulſe at Oxford; and the following turn was given to it by himſelf and his friends. He and they frequently aſſerted, that he could have anſwered the College examination, had he thought proper; but that he ſo much deſpiſed the trifling queſtions which were propoſed to him, that, inſtead of returning ſuitable replies, he only launched out into ſatirical reflections on the abilities of the Gentleman whoſe office it was to make the trial of his literary improvements (a). If this was really the truth of the caſe, Mr. Churchill's conduct, to ſay the leaſt of it, was highly imprudent. Whoever wiſhes to receive the benefit of an univerſity education, muſt comply with the cuſtomary forms of admiſſion; and it would be perfectly ridiculous for a young man to have it in his own power to preſcribe in what mode he ſhould be examined, previouſly to his matriculation. Churchill's rejection from Oxford, will ſupply one very probable reaſon for the ſeverity with which, in the courſe of his writings, he hath ſometimes treated that famous ſeminary.

(a) Annual Register, Part 2d, p. 58, 59.

After this event, Mr. Churchill continued to proſecute his ſtudies at Weſtminſter ſchool; and there can be no cauſe to doubt, but that he would ſoon have been eſteemed properly qualified for an entrance into one of our learned univerſities, if his views of this kind had not been prevented by an act of imprudence which had a conſiderable effect upon the colour of his future life. When he was little more than ſeventeen years of age, he contracted an intimacy with a young lady in the neighbourhood, which ſprang up into a warm affection, and was followed by a haſty marriage. This, like many others, was a match which began in paſſion and ended in diſguſt. Their regard, however, for each other, which in its origin was mutual and ſincere, was preſerved in its purity and ardour for a number of years. In the ſequeſtered life which Mr. Churchill was now obliged to lead, he made ſuch a progreſs in literature, and ſuſtained ſo good a character, that, notwithſtanding his want of an univerſity education, he was thought worthy of being admitted into holy orders at the uſual age of obtaining them, and accordingly, was ordained by Dr. Sherlock, at that time Biſhop of London. The firſt preferment he received in the church was a very trifling one, being only a ſmall curacy of thirty pounds a year in Wales. To this remote part of the kingdom he carried his wife, and, having taken a little houſe, he applied himſelf to the duties of his ſtation with aſſiduity and chearfulneſs. His behaviour gained him the love and eſteem of his pariſhioners; and his ſermons, though ſomewhat raiſed above the level of his audience, were commended and followed. What chiefly diſturbed him was the ſmallneſs of his income, which would, indeed, have been too narrow for the ſupport of a family, even where a much greater degree of œconomy was exerciſed than was ſuitable to Mr. Churchill's natural diſpoſition. To ſupply, therefore, the deficiency of his ſcanty ſalary, he entered into a branch of trade which he hoped might raiſe him to competence, and, perhaps, to riches; but which, in fact, involved him in debts that long involved him in perplexity and trouble. The buſineſs in which he engaged was that of keeping a Cyder-Warehouſe, with a view of vending that commodity in the different parts of the neighbouring country. A man of genius and a Poet was but ill qualified for ſuch an undertaking. Mr. Churchill could not deſcend to the patience and frugality which are neceſſary in the common courſe of merchandiſe, where ſmall gains are to be quietly expected and carefully accumulated. A kind of rural bankruptcy was, therefore, the conſequence of the attempt (b).

The ill ſucceſs of Mr. Churchill's trading ſcheme brought him back to London, and his father ſoon after dying, he ſucceeded him as Curate and Lecturer in the pariſh of St. John's. The emoluments of his ſituation not amounting to a full hundred pounds a year, in order to improve his finances, he undertook to teach young ladies to read and write Engliſh with propriety and correctneſs, and was engaged for this purpoſe in the boarding-ſchool of Mrs. Dennis, a governeſs who had the honour of being one of the firſt introducers of a laudable cuſtom, which hath ſince been adopted in many of the reputable ſeminaries of female education. Mr. Churchill conducted himſelf in his new employment with all the decorum becoming his clerical profeſſion. Still, however, his method of living bore no proportion to his income; ſo that he contracted a variety of debts which he was totally incapable of paying; and a gaol, the terror of indigent genius, ſeemed ready to cloſe upon his miſeries (c). From this wretched ſituation he was relieved by the benevolent interpoſition of Dr. Lloyd, the ſecond Maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool, and father of Robert Lloyd the Poet. The Doctor undertook to treat with Churchill's creditors, and ſucceeded in engaging them to conſent to a compoſition of five ſhillings in the pound. In an inſtance which fell under the knowledge of the writer of the preſent article, as an Executor and a Guardian, Mr. Churchill, when he had obtained money by his publications, voluntarily came, and paid the full amount of the original debt. It is highly probable, from this unſolicited and unexpected act of equitable retribution, that his conduct was the ſame in ſome other caſes.

and

The time now approached for Mr. Churchill's appearing in the world as an author. Hitherto nothing had come from him in this character, though he was known among his acquaintance to be a man of a very vigorous imagination, and a ſtrong underſtanding; and though he was in the habits of intimacy with Thornton, Colman, and Lloyd, who had already begun to make a conſiderable figure in the Republic of Letters. With the laſt of theſe gentlemen he was connected in the ties of the cloſeſt friendſhip. Mr. Lloyd had printed a poem, entitled the Actor, which met with a very favourable reception from the public, and juſtly procured him a conſiderable degree of reputation. By the ſucceſs of his friend, Mr. Churchill is ſuppoſed to have been ſtimulated (d) (how truly we know not) to exert his poetical talents upon a ſubject of a ſimilar kind, though more appropriated and perſonal. The theme he pitched upon was admirably ſuited to his genius and his taſte. He had long been a frequenter of the theatre, and had beſtowed inceſſant attention on ſtage repreſentation. The ſcene of his obſervations was uſually the firſt row of the pit, next to the orcheſtra. From this place he thought that he could beſt diſcern the real workings of the paſſions in the Players, or the artifices which they ſubſtituted in the room of genuine nature and feeling. As Mr. Churchill was thus qualified, by judgment and experience, for delineating the excellencies and defects of the Actors, ſo the vigour of his fancy, and the ſtrength of his conceptions, enabled him to do it in the moſt lively colours. In the month of March, 1761, the "Roſciad" appeared [A]. The firſt edition ſtole as it were into the

There is a character towards the beginning of the Roſciad, which is drawn with uncommon ſeverity and ſpirit. Who it was that was intended by the author, we are not ſolicitous to enquire, nor ſhould we wiſh to communicate. Mr. Churchill himſelf meant that the name ſhould be conſigned to oblivion.

In the following lines, the Poet aſſerts, with great energy, that genius is not confined to any country.

" When, from amidſt the throng, a Youth ſtood forth,
" Unknown his perſon, not unknown his worth;
" His look beſpoke applauſe; alone he ſtood,
" Alone he ſtemm'd the mighty critic flood.

" That all perfection needs muſt centre there?
" In ſtates, let ſtrangers blindly be preferr'd;
" In ſtate of letters, Merit ſhould be heard.
" Genius is of no country, her pure ray
" Spreads all abroad, as gen'ral as the day;
" Foe to reſtraint, from place to place ſhe flies,
" And may hereafter e'en in Holland riſe.
" May not (to give a pleaſing fancy ſcope,
" And chear a patriot heart with patriot hope)
" May not ſome great extenſive genius raiſe
" The name of Britain 'bove Athenian praiſe;
" And, whilſt brave thirſt of fame his boſom warms,
" Make England great in Letters as in Arms?
" There may—there hath—and SHAKSPEARE'S muſe aſpires
" Beyond the reach of Greece; with native fires
" Mounting aloft, he wings his daring flight,

The character of Shakſpeare is afterwards farther touched, with a very maſterly hand.

" In the firſt ſeat, in robe of various dyes,

" Sat SHAKSPEARE.—In one hand a wand he bore,
" For mighty wonders fam'd in days of yore;
" The other held a globe, which to his will " Obedient turn'd, and own'd the maſter's ſkill:
" Things of the nobleſt kind his genius drew,
" And look'd through Nature at a ſingle view:
" A looſe he gave to his unbounded ſoul,
" And taught new lands to riſe, new ſeas to roll;
" Call'd into being ſcenes unknown before,
" And, paſſing Nature's bounds, was ſomething more (3)."

The

the world, being very little advertiſed, and publiſhed without a name. A ſecond impreſſion was ſoon called for, in the title page of which the author aſſerted his claim to his own performance. Scarcely ever was there an inſtance of a Poet's riſing ſo ſuddenly from the moſt perfect obſcurity to the greateſt celebrity. To this the Players themſelves contributed more than any other ſet of men. They ran about the town like ſo many ſtricken deer; and while they ſtrove to extract the arrow from the wound by communicating the knowledge of it to their friends, ſpread abroad more and more the fame of the piece. It was pleaſant enough to obſerve, how artfully ſome of them, who were, in fact, the moſt hurt, pretended to be unaffected by the injury done to themſelves, but to feel extremely for the obloquy thrown upon others. "Why," exclaimed one of theſe diſintereſted perſons, "ſhould this man attack Mr. Havard? "I am not at all concerned for myſelf; but what has poor Billy Havard done, that he "muſt be treated ſo cruelly?" "And pray," replied a gentleman who was preſent at this artificial declaration of benevolence, "What has Mr. Havard done too, that he "cannot bear his misfortunes as well as another (e)?" Whilſt the Actors, in different ways, expreſſed their reſentment, the public enjoyed their diſtreſs. The Roſciad was regarded, in general, as a pleaſant and reaſonable retaliation for the mirth which the ſtage had continually excited by the repreſentation of the follies and frailties of mankind. The Poem was not wholly employed in ſatire. Mr. Garrick was commended in the higheſt terms of applauſe; and the various and peculiar excellencies of Mrs. Pritchard, Mrs. Cibber, and Mrs. Clive were celebrated with equal warmth and juſtice. Excepting Mr. Garrick, there was not a ſingle man, amongſt the Players of that period, who, in the firſt impreſſion, entirely eſcaped the Poet's ſatirical laſh [B]. Thoſe who were the moſt eager in expreſſing their anger, had only the misfortune of being treated with greater ſeverity in ſubſequent editions. In this reſpect Mr. Churchill has been blamed by ſome writers; and it has been ſaid, that the Roſciad was not always benefited by the alterations which it received (f). Perhaps there is little foundation for this aſſertion: but however that may be, it is certain that its excellence enabled it firmly to maintain its ground, againſt all oppoſition. Though various pamphlets and poems were publiſhed againſt it, in vindication of the Players, they were ſo poorly written, that they only ſerved to ſwell Mr. Churchill's triumph (g).

The Critical Reviewers happened to be peculiarly unfortunate in the account which they gave of the Roſciad. In ſpeaking of the firſt impreſſion of it, they aſcribed it, with ſome degree of confidence, to Mr. Lloyd; and though they would not pretend abſolutely to aſſert that it was ſolely written by him, they ventured to affirm, that it was

From the author's deſcriptions of the Players in general, we do not purpoſe to make any extracts. His praiſes of Garrick, Mrs. Cibber, Mrs. Pritchard, and other performers, will occur in future articles.

[B] Who entirely eſcaped the Poet's ſatirical laſh.] It may probably not be unamuſing to give ſome account of the different effects which the Roſciad had upon the minds of different Actors. An eminent comic Player is ſaid to have been ſo extremely angry with our Poet for preſuming to include his wife, who hath ſince become one of the greateſt ornaments of the ſtage in tragedy, among thoſe who were cenſured, that he invited Churchill to a tavern, with an intention, as was ſuppoſed, either of expoſtulating with him on his behaviour, or of bringing the matter to a more deciſive diſcuſſion. But Mr. George Garrick, hearing for what purpoſe they had withdrawn, ran to the place of meeting; and, though the contending parties were much enraged, was ſo happy as to reconcile them with a hearty bottle. Our author had ridiculed the only fault which, perhaps, could fairly be charged upon this Actor; and that was, an occaſional defect of memory. This fault he would ſometimes endeavour to hide, by repeating a ſentence two or three times over; to which circumſtance there is an alluſion in the following lines;

"Lo Yates!—Without the leaſt fineſſe of art
"He gets applauſe!—I wiſh he'd get his part.
"When hot impatience is in full career,
"How vilely 'Hark'e! Hark'e!' ſtrikes the ear?"

When the poem was publiſhed, the Player in queſtion, to ſhew his courage, took particular care to reiterate the very words which Churchill had made the record of his ſatire. By this means he cauſed his fault to be far more univerſally known than would otherwiſe have been the caſe. Hitherto the audience in general had been very little acquainted with it; and it afforded no ſmall diverſion to the people behind the ſcenes, that Mr. Yates ſhould thus be the proclaimer of his own defect.

The Actors did not feel themſelves alike aggrieved by Churchill's ſatire. Some of them took no notice of the poem, and others wiſely endeavoured to profit by the ſtrictures which were made on their faults. Barry, Woodward, and Moſſop, who were treated with the greateſt ſeverity, were at that time in Ireland, and owed their firſt knowledge of the rank which they held in the Roſciad to an edition of it publiſhed in Dublin. Havard was more offended than could have been expected from a man of ſo calm and diſpaſſionate a temper. Roſs pleaded guilty, and laughed at his puniſhment, over a glaſs, with his friend Bonnel Thornton. Sparks, who was a man of the world, was above being hurt by a ſtroke or two of ſatire. King, though diſpleaſed, expreſſed no reſentment; and Shuter, out of revenge, got merry with the Poet. Foote, who had himſelf taken ſuch unjuſtifiable liberties with all characters, was outrageouſly offended, and was more violent than any one in his anger. He wrote a proſe dialogue, in which he lampooned Churchill and Lloyd; but he had the diſcretion not to commit it to the preſs. Making uſe of an alliteration, which he was very fond of doing, he called Churchill the clumſy Curate of Clapham (5).

the production, jointly or ſeparately, of the new Triumvirate of Wits, who never let an opportunity ſlip of ſinging their own praiſes (b). The Triumvirate, here referred to, conſiſted of Thornton, Colman, and Lloyd. The miſtake, however, if it had been delivered in leſs offenſive terms, was pardonable, as the author had not ſet his name to the performance. When he aſſerted his claim to the work, the critics acknowledged their error, but did not do it with a very good grace, or, at leaſt, in ſuch a manner as was ſatisfactory to Mr. Churchill. Beſides his not being well pleaſed with the account which had been given of his poem, he wiſhed to add ſomething farther on the ſubject of the Roſciad, and to juſtify the attack he had made on the players. Accordingly, in a ſhort time, he publiſhed his "Apology; addreſſed to the Critical Reviewers [C]." Whatever reaſons theſe Gentlemen had to be diſſatisfied with the poem, the players themſelves were not ſo much offended as they had been with the Roſciad. The author had, indeed, treated the profeſſion of acting with great contempt; and had painted, in the ſtrongeſt colours, the meanneſs and diſtreſs of itinerant companies, and the unhappy ſhifts to which they are occaſionally reduced. But all this the London actors regarded as a trifling injury, compared with the ſatire which had been directed againſt their perſonal faults. It was, likewiſe, no ſmall conſolation to them, that their Maſter, the mighty Roſcius himſelf, had not wholly been ſpared: for Mr. Garrick was certainly aimed at in the following lines.

(b) Critical Review, vol. xi. p. 212. 339, 340.

" Let the vain tyrant ſit amidſt his guards,
" His puny green-room wits, and venal bards,

" Bow down, ye ſlaves; before theſe idols fall;
" Let genius ſtoop to them who've none at all;

[C] His Apology; addreſſed to the Critical Reviewers.] In this poem, the author hath pleaſantly ridiculed the frippery of ſome modern poetry.

" Rude and unſkilful in the Poet's trade,
" I kept no NAIADS by me ready-made;
" Ne'er did I colours high in air advance,
" Torn from the bleeding fopperies of France;
" No flimſey linſey-woolſey ſcenes I wrote,
" With patches here and there like Joſeph's coat.
" Me humbler themes befit: Secure, for me,
" Let Playwrights ſmuggle nonſenſe, duty free:
" Secure, for me, ye lambs, ye lambkins bound,
" And friſk, and frolic o'er the fairy ground:
" Secure, for me, thou pretty little fawn,
" Lick SYLVIA's hand, and crop the flow'ry lawn:
" Uncenſur'd let the gentle breezes rove,
" Thro' the green umbrage of th' enchanted grove;
" Secure, for me, let foppiſh Nature ſmile,
" And play the coxcomb in the DESART ISLE (6)."

The ſituation of a company of itinerant Players is deſcribed by our Poet with great ſtrength of humour.

" The ſtrolling tribe, a deſpicable race,
" Like wand'ring Arabs, ſhift from place to place.
" Vagrants by law, to Juſtice open laid,
" They tremble, of the beadle's laſh afraid,
" And fawning cringe, for wretched means of life,
" To Madam May'reſs, or his Worſhip's Wife.
" The mighty monarch, in theatric ſack,
" Carries his whole regalia at his back;
" His royal conſort heads the female band,
" And leads the heir-apparent in her hand;
" The pannier'd aſs creeps on with conſcious pride,
" Bearing a future prince on either ſide.
" No choice muſicians in this troop are found " To varniſh nonſenſe with the charms of ſound;
" No ſwords, no daggers, not one poiſon'd bowl;
" No lightning flaſhes here, no thunders roll;
" No guards to ſwell the monarch's train are ſhown;
" The monarch here muſt be a hoſt alone.
" No ſolemn pomp, no ſlow proceſſions here;
" No AMMON's entry, and no JULIET's bier.
" By need compell'd to proſtitute his art,
" The varied actor flies from part to part;
" And, ſtrange diſgrace to all theatric pride!
" His character is ſhifted with his ſide.
" In ſhabby ſtate they ſtrut, and tatter'd robe;
" The ſcene a blanket, and a barn the globe.
" No high conceits their mod'rate wiſhes raiſe,
" Content with humble profit, humble praiſe.
" Let dowdies ſimper, and let bumpkins ſtare,
" The ſtrolling pageant hero treads in air:
" Pleas'd for his hour, he to mankind gives law,
" And ſnores the next out on a truſs of ſtraw (7)."

(7) Ibid. p. 65, 66.

The following is the author's apology for his own verſification:

" But what is Candour, what is Humour's vein,
" Tho' Judgment join to conſecrate the ſtrain,
" If curious numbers will not aid afford,
" Nor choiceſt muſic play in ev'ry word?
" Verſes muſt run, to charm a modern ear,
" From all harſh, rugged interruptions clear.
" Soft let them breathe, as Zephyr's balmy breeze;
" Smooth let their current flow, as ſummer ſeas;
" Perfect then only deem'd when they diſpenſe
" A happy tuneful vacancy of ſenſe.
" Italian fathers thus, with barb'rous rage,
" Fit helpleſs infants for the ſqueaking ſtage;
" Deaf to the calls of pity, Nature wound,
" And mangle vigour for the ſake of ſound.
" Henceforth farewell then fev'riſh thirſt of fame;
" Farewell the longings for a Poet's name;
" Periſh my Muſe;—a wiſh 'bove all ſevere
" To him who ever held the Muſes dear—
" If e'er her labours weaken to refine
" The gen'rous roughneſs of a nervous line (8)."

(8) Ibid. p. 70, 71.

We ſhall only add Mr. Churchill's character of Dryden.

" Here let me bend, great DRYDEN, at thy ſhrine,
" Thou deareſt name to all the tuneful nine.
" What if ſome dull Lines in cold order creep,
" And with his theme the poet ſeems to ſleep,
" Still, when his ſubject riſes proud to view,
" With equal ſtrength the Poet riſes too.
" With ſtrong invention, nobleſt vigour fraught,
" Thought ſtill ſprings up and riſes out of thought;
" Numbers ennobling numbers in their courſe;
" In varied ſweetneſs flow, in varied force;
" The pow'rs of Genius and of Judgment join,
" And the whole Art of Poetry is Thine (9)."

" Ne'er will I flatter, cringe, or bend the knee
" To thoſe who, ſlaves to all, are ſlaves to me (i)."

The manager felt all the force of theſe ſarcaſtic ſtrokes, and was extremely unhappy that he ſhould have provoked ſo irritable and ſo powerful a writer. Accordingly, he wrote a long letter to Churchill, which, beſides comprehending an apology for himſelf and the players, was full of encomiums upon his uncommon vein of poetry, and contained a kind of deprecation of his future wrath. A friend, to whom Mr. Garrick ſhewed the letter, entirely diſapproved of it; and informed him that the author of the Roſciad, who was a man of a quick diſcernment and undaunted ſpirit, would not think the better of him for his humiliations and flatteries (k).

(k) Life of Garrick, ubi ſupra.

Mr. Churchill being now become ſo greatly celebrated, and having, at the ſame time, procured a large number of enemies, it was natural that reſearches ſhould be made into his ſituation, connexions and character; and upon enquiry it was found, that he was not remarkable for the regularity of his manners, and that he particularly indulged himſelf in ſitting up very late over a bottle. The reproaches hence caſt upon him, gave occaſion to his next production, entitled " Night; an Epiſtle to Robert Lloyd [D]." The object of this poem was to vindicate his conduct, or rather to avow it in the face of the public. The " Night" was followed by the firſt book of " The Ghoſt," a work that took its riſe from a ridiculous impoſture carried on in Cock-Lane, near Weſt-Smithfield, and to which ſome men of eminent abilities and character paid too ſerious an attention. Neither of theſe performances being ſo popular as the Roſciad and the Apology, Mr. Churchill was deſirous of producing ſomething which ſhould more ſtrongly excite the curioſity of the nation. In this he ſucceeded, though we muſt ever lament the ſubject he fixed upon, and the turn of mind with which it is treated. Availing himſelf of the diſputes in politics which were then carried on with peculiar acrimony, and influenced by private friendſhip, he publiſhed his " Prophecy of Famine; a Scots " Paſtoral." Of this piece Mr. Wilkes is ſaid to have pronounced, before its appearance, that he was ſure it would take, as it was at once perſonal, poetical, and political. His prediction was accompliſhed; for the Poem had a very rapid and extenſive ſale, and " Make yourſelves rules to all the world beſide;

In the ſucceeding lines he hath given the favourable ſide of his own character.

" Foe to reſtraint, unpractis'd in deceit,
" Too reſolute, from nature's active heat,
" To brook affronts, and tamely paſs them by;
" Too proud to flatter, too ſincere to lye,
" Too plain to pleaſe, too honeſt to be great;
" Give me, kind Heav'n, an humbler, happier ſtate:
" Far from the place where men with pride deceive,
" Where raſcals promiſe, and where fools believe;
" Far from the walk of folly, vice and ſtrife,
" Calm, independent, let me ſteal thro' life,
" Nor one vain wiſh my ſteady thoughts beguile
" To fear his lordſhip's frown, or court his ſmile.
" Unfit for greatneſs, I her ſnares defy,
" And look on riches with untainted eye.
" To others let the glitt'ring bawbles fall,
" Content ſhall place us far above them all (11)."

(11) Ibid. p. 85, 86.

The patriotic turn of the nation is expoſed with great humour.

" Britons, like Roman ſpirits fam'd of old,
" Are caſt by nature in a Patriot mould;
" No private joy, no private grief they know,
" Their ſoul's ingroſs'd by public weal or woe.
" Inglorious eaſe, like ours, they greatly ſcorn:
" Let care with nobler wreaths their brows adorn.
" Gladly they toil beneath the ſtateſman's pains,
" Give them but credit for a ſtateſman's brains.
" All would be deem'd, e'en from the cradle, fit
" To rule in politics as well as wit.
" The grave, the gay, the fopling, and the dunce,
" Start up (God bleſs us!) ſtateſmen all at once.
" His mighty charge of ſoul the prieſt forgets,
" The court-bred lord his promiſes and debts,
" Soldiers their fame, miſers forget their pelf,
" The rake his miſtreſs, and the fop himſelf;
" Whilſt thoughts of higher moment claim their care,
" And their wiſe heads the weight of kingdoms bear.
" Females themſelves the glorious ardour feel,
" And boaſt an equal, or a greater zeal,
" From nymph to nymph the ſtate-infection flies,
" Swells in her breaſt, and ſparkles in her eyes.
" O'erwhelm'd by politics lie malice, pride,
" Envy, and twenty other faults beſide.
" No more their little flutt'ring hearts confeſs
" A paſſion for applauſe, or rage for dreſs;
" No more they pant for Public Raree-shows,
" Or loſe one thought on monkeys or on beaux.
" Coquettes no more purſue the jilting plan,
" And luſtful prudes forget to rail at man.
" The darling theme CÆCILIA's ſelf will chuſe,
" Nor thinks of ſcandal whilſt ſhe talks of news.
" The CIT, a Common-Council-Man by place,
" Ten thouſand mighty nothings in his face,
" By ſituation as by nature great,
" With nice preciſion parcels out the ſtate;

" Objects himſelf, and to himſelf replies;
" Wielding aloft the Politician rod,
" Makes Pitt by turns a devil and a god;
" Maintains, e'en to the very teeth of pow'r,
" The ſame thing right and wrong in half an hour,
" Now all is well, now he ſuſpects a plot,
" And plainly proves, whatever is, is not.
" Fearfully wiſe, he ſhakes his empty head,
" And deals out empires as he deals out thread.
" His uſeleſs ſcales are in a corner flung,
" And Europe's balance hangs upon his tongue (12)."

Churchill was extolled by his admirers as ſuperior to Pope (l). This was undoubtedly carrying his praiſe to an undue height of exaggeration. It cannot, however, be denied, that the Author has diſplayed great force of abilities in the Prophecy of Famine [E]; though the malignity which he has ſhewn againſt Scotland and its inhabitants is totally inexcuſable.

(l) Annual Regiſter, ubi ſupra, p. 61.

Whilſt the literary fame of Mr. Churchill ſtood thus high with a large part, at leaſt, of the public, his perſonal conduct was very reprehenſible. He laid aſide all the external decorums of his profeſſion, diveſted himſelf of his clerical habit, and appeared in the dreſs of a blue coat with metal buttons, a gold-laced waiſtcoat, a gold-laced hat, and ruffles. This part of his behaviour was wholly diſapproved of by his moſt intimate friends. They conſidered it as a very blameable oppoſition to the decencies of life, and as likely to be hurtful to his intereſt; ſince the abilities he was poſſeſſed of, and the figure he made in political conteſts, would, perhaps, have recommended him to ſome noble patron, from whom he might have received a valuable benefice. I remember well, that he dreſſed his younger ſon in a Scotch plaid, like a little Highlander, and carried him every where in that garb. The boy being aſked by a Gentleman with whom I was in company, why he was cloathed in ſuch a manner, anſwered with great vivacity; "Sir, "my father hates the Scotch, and does it to plague them?" In other reſpects Mr. Churchill's conduct was more than indiſcreet. He plunged into various irregularities, and lived no longer with his wife; though whether his quitting her was at this particular juncture we are not able to determine. "Some people, obſerves a certain writer, have "been unkind enough to ſay, that Mrs. Churchill gave the firſt juſt cauſe of ſeparation. "But nothing can be more falſe than this rumour; and we can aſſure the public, that [E] Great force of abilities in the Prophecy of Famine.] Without concerning ourſelves with the ſatirical object of the poem, we ſhall be ſatisfied with adverting to a few paſſages of a general nature, which are deſerving of peculiar notice. The delineation, at the beginning of the Prophecy of Famine, of the progreſs of a young poet's mind, is both ſevere and pleaſant.

"When CUPID firſt inſtructs his darts to fly
"From the ſly corner of ſome cook-maid's eye,
"The ſtripling raw, juſt enter'd in his teens,
"Receives the wound, and wonders what it means;
"His heart, like dripping, melts, and new deſire
"Within him ſtirs, each time ſhe ſtirs the fire;
"Trembling and bluſhing he the fair one views,
"And fain would ſpeak, but can't—without a MUSE.
"So to the ſacred mount he takes his way,
"Prunes his young wings, and tunes his infant lay,
"His oaten reed to rural ditties frames,
"To flocks and rocks, to hills and rills proclaims,
"In ſimpleſt notes, and all unpoliſh'd ſtrains,
"The loves of nymphs, and eke the loves of ſwains.
"Clad, as your nymphs were always clad of yore,
"In ruſtic weeds—a cook-maid now no more—
"Beneath an aged oak LARDELLA lies—
"Green moſs her couch; her canopy the ſkies.
"From aromatic ſhrubs the roguiſh gale
"Steals young perfumes, and wafts them thro' the vale.
"The youth, turn'd ſwain, and ſkill'd in ruſtic lays,
"Faſt by her ſide his am'rous deſcant plays.
"Herds lowe, Flocks bleat, Pies chatter, Ravens ſcream,
"And the full chorus dies a-down the ſtream.
"The ſtreams, with muſic freighted, as they paſs,
"Preſent the fair LARDELLA with a glaſs,
"And ZEPHYR, to compleat the love-ſick plan,
"Waves his light wings, and ſerves her for a fan.
"But, when maturer Judgment takes the lead,
"Theſe childiſh toys on Reaſon's altar bleed;
"Form'd after ſome great man, whoſe name breeds awe,
"Whoſe ev'ry ſentence Faſhion makes a law,
"Who on mere credit his vain trophies rears,
"And founds his merit on our ſervile fears;
"Then we diſcard the workings of the heart,
"And nature's baniſh'd by mechanic art;
"Then, deeply read, our reading muſt be ſhown;
"Vain is that knowledge which remains unknown.
"Then OSTENTATION marches to our aid,
"And letter'd PRIDE ſtalks forth in full parade;
"Beneath their care behold the work refine,
"Pointed each ſentence, poliſh'd ev'ry line:
"Trifles are dignified, and taught to wear
"The robes of Ancients with a Modern air,
"NONSENSE with Claſſic ornaments is grac'd,
"And paſſes current with the ſtamp of TASTE.
"Then the rude THEOCRITE is ranſack'd o'er,
"And courtly MARO call'd from MINCIO's ſhore;
"Sicilian Muſes on our mountains roam,
"Eaſy and free as if they were at home;
"NYMPHS, NAIADS, NEREIDS, DRYADS, SATYRS, FAUNS
"Sport in our floods, and trip it o'er our lawns;
"Flow'rs, which once flouriſh'd fair in GREECE and ROME,
"More fair revive in ENGLAND's meads to bloom;
"Skies without cloud exotic ſuns adorn;
"And roſes bluſh, but bluſh without a thorn;
"Landſcapes unknown to dowdy Nature, riſe,
"And new creations ſtrike our wond'ring eyes (13)." (13) Churchill's works, ubi ſupra, p. 97—100.

The author deſcribes himſelf as of a very different turn.

"Me, whom no muſe of heav'nly birth inſpires,
"No judgment tempers when raſh genius fires;
"Who boaſt no merit but mere knack of rime,
"Short gleams of ſenſe, and ſatire out of time,
"Who cannot follow where trim fancy leads
"By prattling ſtreams o'er flow'r empurpled meads;
"Who often, but without ſucceſs, have pray'd
"For apt ALLITERATION's artful aid;
"Who would, but cannot, with a maſter's ſkill,
"Coin fine new epithets, which mean no ill,
"Me, thus uncouth, thus ev'ry way unfit
"For pacing poeſy, and ambling wit,
"TASTE with contempt beholds, nor deigns to place
"Amongſt the loweſt of her favour'd race (14)." (14) Ibid. p. 101.

The deſcription of famine has in it the terrible graces of Sir Joſhua Reynolds's picture of Ugulino.

"Pale FAMINE rear'd the head; her eager eyes,
"Where hunger e'en to madneſs ſeem'd to riſe,
"Speaking aloud her throes and pangs of heart,
"Strain'd to get looſe, and from their orbs to ſtart;
"Her hollow cheeks were each a deep-ſunk cell,
"Where wretchedneſs and horror lov'd to dwell;
"With double rows of uſeleſs teeth ſupplied,
"Her mouth, from ear to ear, extended wide,
"Which, when for want of food her entrails pin'd,
"She op'd, and curſing ſwallow'd nought but wind;
"All ſhrivell'd was her ſkin, and here and there,
"Making their way by force, her bones lay bare:
"Such filthy ſight to hide from human view,
"O'er her foul limbs a tatter'd Plaid ſhe threw (15)." (15) Ibid. p. 117.

"her

" her conduct in private life, and among her acquaintance, was ever irreproachable (m)." We have our doubts concerning the truth of what is here asserted, notwithstanding the positivity with which it is delivered. It was always understood in Westminster, that Mrs. Churchill's imprudence kept too near a pace with that of her husband. However, we do not hence mean in the least to justify his disorderly and licentious manner of living.

(m) Annual Register, ubi supra.

Mr. Churchill being now embarked as a political satirist, from which character he derived great fame and profit, next drew his pen against a man whose genius he admired; and with whom he and Mr. Wilkes had long been in the habits of friendship, he celebrated Hogarth. It must be acknowledged that Hogarth himself afforded the original cause of offence. In a print, called the Times, he had attacked Lord Temple and Mr. Pitt, and soon after published a caricature of Mr. Wilkes. This, which was too much for Churchill to bear, gave rise to the " Epistle to William Hogarth [F]," wherein that eminent painter, whilst justice is done to his extraordinary talents, is treated with all the severity of satire. When Hogarth had formed the design of holding out Lord Temple, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Churchill, and Mr. Wilkes to the public, as objects of ridicule, in a series of prints, the last gentleman, by two of their common acquaintance, remonstrated with him against such a proceeding, as what would not only be unfriendly in the highest degree, but extremely injudicious. It was urged to him, that such a pencil ought to be universal and moral, to speak to all ages, and to all nations, not to be dipt in the dirt of the faction of a day, of an insignificant part of the country, when it might command the admiration of the whole. It would have been well for Mr. Hogarth, if he had listened to this salutary advice, as by so doing he would have saved himself from the most extreme mortification. Churchill's satire struck him to the heart, and is thought to have contributed to the acceleration of his decease. Mr. Hogarth's revenge against the Poet, terminated in vamping up an old print of a Pug-Dog and a Bear, which he published under the title of " The Bruiser C. Churchill (once the Reverend!) in the character of " a Russian Hercules, &c." So feeble a blow at his antagonist was but a poor compensation

[F] Gave rise to the " Epistle to William Hogarth."] The speech of Candour, near the beginning of the poem, is, in our opinion, somewhat too long. The following lines, describing the obnoxiousness of merit to envy, are finely expressed.

" But should thy soul, form'd in some luckless hour,
" Vile Int'rest scorn, nor madly grasp at Pow'r;
" Should Love of Fame, in ev'ry noble mind
" A brave disease, with love of Virtue join'd,
" Spur thee to deeds of pith, where Courage, tried
" In Reason's court, is amply justified;
" Or fond of knowledge, and averse to strife,
" Should'st Thou prefer the calmer walk of life;
" Should'st Thou, by pale and sickly STUDY led,
" Pursue coy Science to the Fountain head;
" Virtue thy guide, and Public Good thy end,
" Should ev'ry thought to our improvement tend,
" To curb the passions, to enlarge the mind,
" Purge the sick weal, and humanize mankind:
" Rage in her eye, and Malice in her breast,
" Redoubled Horror grinning on her crest,
" Fiercer each snake, and sharper ev'ry dart,
" Quick from her cell shall madd'ning ENVY start.
" Then shalt Thou find, but find alas! too late,
" How vain is worth! how short is Glory's date!
" Then shalt Thou find, whilst Friends with Foes conspire
" To give more proof than virtue would desire,
" Thy danger chiefly lies in acting well;
" No crime's so great as daring to excel (16)."

(16) Churchill's works, ubi supra, p. 129.

The address to Hogarth is equally spirited and severe.

" HOGARTH—I take thee, CANDOUR, at thy word,
" Accept thy proffer'd terms, and will be heard;
" Thee have I heard with virulence declaim,
" Nothing retain'd of Candour but the name;
" By Thee have I been charg'd in angry strains
" With that mean falshood which my soul disdains—
" HOGARTH stand forth—Nay hang not thus aloof—
" Now, CANDOUR, now Thou shalt receive such proof,
" Such damning proof, that henceforth Thou shalt fear
" To tax my wrath, and own my conduct clear—
" HOGARTH stand forth—I dare thee to be tried " In that great Court, where Conscience must preside;
" At that most solemn bar hold up thy hand;
" Think before whom, on what account you stand—
" Speak, but consider well—from first to last
" Review thy life, weigh ev'ry action past—
" Nay, you shall have no reason to complain—
" Take longer time, and view them o'er again—
" Can'st Thou remember from thy earliest youth,
" And as thy God must judge Thee, speak the truth,
" A single instance where, Self laid aside,
" And Justice taking place of fear and pride,
" Thou with an equal eye did'st GENIUS view,
" And give to Merit what was Merit's due?
" Genius and Merit are a sure offence,
" And thy soul sickens at the name of Sense.
" Is any one so foolish to succeed,
" On ENVY's altar he is doom'd to bleed?
" HOGARTH, a guilty pleasure in his eyes,
" The place of Executioner supplies.
" See how he glotes, enjoys the sacred feast,
" And proves himself by cruelty a priest (17)."

(17) Ibid. p. 141, 142.

The poem concludes with a reflection truly fine and pathetic.

" Sure 'tis a curse which angry Fates impose,
" To mortify man's arrogance, that those
" Who're fashion'd of some better sort of clay,
" Much sooner than the common herd decay.
" What bitter pangs must humbled GENIUS feel,
" In their last hours, to view a SWIFT and STEELE?
" How must ill-boding horrors fill her breast
" When She beholds Men, mark'd above the rest
" For qualities most dear, plung'd from that height,
" And sunk, deep sunk, in second Childhood's night?
" Are Men, indeed, such things, and are the best
" More subject to this evil, than the rest,
" To drivel out whole years of Ideot Breath,
" And fit the Monuments of living Death?
" O, galling circumstance to human pride!
" Abasing Thought, but not to be denied!
" With curious Art the Brain too finely wrought,
" Preys on herself, and is destroy'd by Thought.
" Constant Attention wears the active mind,
" Blots out her pow'rs, and leaves a blank behind.
" But let not Youth, to insolence allied,
" In heat of blood, in full career of pride,
" Possess'd of GENIUS, with unhallow'd rage,
" Mock the infirmities of rev'rend age.
" The greatest GENIUS to this Fate may bow;
" REYNOLDS, in time, may be like HOGARTH now (18)."

(18) Ibid. p. 156, 157.

ſation for the deep wound he had received. It muſt ever be lamented, that men of genius who had been intimate friends, and might have continued ſuch as long as they lived, ſhould have their union diſſolved, and diſcord ſown among them, by the demon of politics and party (n).

(n) Monthly Review, vol. xli. p. 380—382. In an article containing an account of Letters to and from Mr. Wilkes, vol. i.

The poems we have hitherto ſpoken of employed Mr. Churchill in 1761, 1762, and part of 1763. During the ſame time he continued to publiſh, at different intervals, "The Ghoſt," the fourth and concluding book of which appeared in the laſt of the years now mentioned. The moſt celebrated paſſage in this work was the character of Pompoſo, intended for Dr. Johnſon, and which was much extolled by that Gentleman's enemies. The Doctor had offended Churchill, by declaring that his poetry had but little merit. The only reply which Dr. Johnſon made to our Author's ſatire was, that he thought him a ſhallow fellow in the beginning, and that he could ſay nothing worſe of him ſtill (o). Highly as we reverence this eminent Writer's character and abilities, we muſt expreſs ourſelves to be of a different opinion. However inferior Churchill might be, in many reſpects, to Dr. Johnſon, he certainly did not deſerve the appellation of a ſhallow fellow. He was undoubtedly poſſeſſed of a ſound and vigorous underſtanding, though it might not always be prudently and happily applied. The contemptuous terms in which men of real genius are apt to ſpeak of each other, we have too often had occaſion to obſerve and lament. With regard to the poem of "The Ghoſt," it may in general be remarked, that, beſides its being compoſed in verſes of eight ſyllables, it is written in a very deſultory and digreſſive manner. It is difficult to determine what plan and deſign the Author had in view, and, perhaps, he could ſcarcely have explained the matter himſelf. The work, therefore, doth not, upon the whole, excite much of our approbation, though there are in it ſome ſhining and beautiful paſſages [G]. Even Lloyd, the great panegyriſt of Churchhill, hints at the ſlovenly nature

(o) Annual Regiſter, ubi ſupra.

[G] Though there are in it ſome ſhining and beautiful paſſages.] The firſt book contains a general account of the frauds which have been carried on, in different ages, in conſequence of the deſire of mankind to know future events; and it exhibits, likewiſe, a good repreſentation of the characters that apply for information about their future fortune. In the ſecond book, the following lines may be regarded as truly poetic:

" With ſettled faith and pious awe,
" Eſtabliſh'd by the voice of Law,
" Then POETS to the MUSES came,
" And from their Altars caught the flame.
" GENIUS, with PHOEBUS for his guide,
" The MUSE aſcending by his ſide,
" With tow'ring pinions dar'd to ſoar,
" Where eye could ſcarcely ſtrain before (19)."

(19) Churchill's works, ubi ſupra, p. 189.

In the deſcription of truth are many happy ſtrokes, among which the author's own regard to it is expreſſed with great energy.

" If, in the giddy hours of Youth,
" My conſtant ſoul adher'd to TRUTH;
" If, from the Time I firſt wrote Man,
" I ſtill purſu'd thy ſacred plan,
" Tempted by Intereſt in vain
" To wear mean Falſhood's golden chain;
" If, for a ſeaſon drawn away,
" Starting from Virtue's path aſtray,
" All low diſguiſe I ſcorn'd to try,
" And dar'd to ſin, but not to lye;
" Hither, O hither, condeſcend,
" ETERNAL TRUTH, thy ſteps to bend,
" And favour Him, who ev'ry hour
" Confeſſes and obeys thy pow'r (20)!"

(20) Ibid. p. 194.

The ſubſequent verſes may be ſelected as proofs of our Poet's ability in bold deſcription.

" Dark was the Night, it was that Hour
" When TERROR reigns in fulleſt Pow'r,
" When, as the Learn'd of old have ſaid,
" The yawning Grave gives up her dead,
" When MURDER, RAPINE by her ſide,
" Stalks o'er the earth with Giant ſtride;
" Our QUIXOTES (for that Knight of old
" Was not in Truth by half ſo bold,
" Tho' REASON at the ſame time cries,
" Our QUIXOTES are not half ſo wiſe,
" Since they, with other follies, boaſt
" An Expedition 'gainſt a Ghoſt)
" Thro' the dull deep ſurrounding gloom,
" In cloſe array, tow'rds FANNY's tomb
" Adventur'd forth—CAUTION before,
" With heedful ſtep, the lanthorn bore,
" Pointing at Graves; and in the Rear,
" Trembling, and talking loud, went FEAR.
" The Church-yard teem'd—th' unſettled ground,
" As in an Ague, ſhook around;
" While in ſome dreary vault confin'd,
" Or riding on the hollow Wind,
" HORROR, which turns the heart to ſtone,
" In dreadful ſounds was heard to groan.
" All ſtaring, wild, and out of breath,
" At length they reach the place of death (21)."

(21) Ibid. p. 218, 219.

The line

Trembling, and talking loud, went FEAR,

preſents an image equally juſt and poetical. Mr. Churchill is very fond of the proſopopeia or perſonification, and makes great uſe of it in ſeveral of his poems. In the third book of the Ghoſt, the privileges of a Poet are thus happily repreſented.

" The Man, who deals in humble Proſe,
" Tied down by rule and method, goes;
" But they who court the vig'rous Muſe,
" Their carriage have a right to chuſe.
" Free as the Air, and unconfin'd,
" Swift as the motions of the Mind,
" The POET darts from place to place,
" And inſtant bounds o'er Time and Space.
" Nature (whilſt blended fire and ſkill " Inflame our paſſions to his will)
" Smiles at her violated Laws,
" And crowns his daring with applauſe (22)."

(22) Churchill's works, vol. ii. p. 2, 3.

The deſcription of Fame, which is very long, has in it much ſatire; and ſeveral parts of it are happily imagined. Our readers will not be diſpleaſed with us for tranſcribing the ſucceeding lines.

" Swift thro' the regions of the ſky,
" Above the reach of human eye,
" Onward ſhe drove the furious blaſt,
" And rapid as a whirlwind paſt
" O'er Countries, once the ſeats of Taſte,
" By Time and Ignorance laid waſte; nature of the compoſition, in the following lines, which are, indeed, put into the mouth of the Cobler of Cripplegate.

" The prieſt, I grant, has ſomething clever,
" A ſomething that will laſt for ever.
" Let him, in part, be made your pattern,
" Whoſe muſe, now Queen, and now a ſlattern,
" Trick'd out in ROSCIAD rules the roaſt,
" Turns trapes and trollop in the GHOST,
" By turns both tickles us, and warms,
" And, drunk or ſober, has her charms (p)."

(p) Lloyd's Poetical works, vol. ii. p. 94.

Nearly at the time when the laſt book of the Ghoſt appeared, Mr. Churchill publiſhed " The Conference," in which he returned to his uſual meaſure of verſe, the heroic, being the meaſure wherein he moſt excelled; though he had lately begun to introduce into it too many proſaic lines. The plan of the poem is ſimilar to that of one of Pope's ſatires. A dialogue is ſuppoſed to be carried on between the Author and a noble Lord, who is repreſented as giving him much good worldly advice, to which he anſwers with great ſpirit, and in his replies indulges his ſatiric vein with no ſmall degree of freedom. One of the moſt ſtriking paſſages in the Conference is that in which he expreſſes the deepeſt contrition for a recent action of his life, that was indeed highly to his diſhonour [H]. He had ſeduced and carried off the daughter of a tradeſman in Weſtminſter. In a little more than a fortnight his paſſion ſubſided, and the young woman became very ſorry for her crime. Accordingly, a wiſe and judicious friend wrote for her a letter to her father, expreſſive of her penitence, and of her deſire to return home. Her father, with equal tenderneſs and prudence, received her into his houſe; and ſhe might have been fully reſtored to a virtuous conduct, had it not been for the ſeverity of an elder ſiſter, who was continually loading her with reproaches. Wearied with this uſage, ſhe applied to Churchill, offering to return to him again; which he thought himſelf bound to admit, by the ideas he entertained of gratitude and honour. The true point of virtue would have been, to have provided, as amply as he could, for the young woman's ſupport, and to have had no criminal connexion with her in future.

Our Author's next poem, if we miſtake not, was " The Duelliſt," in three books, written in verſes of eight ſyllables. The occaſion of the work is well known, being Mr. Martin's challenge to Mr. Wilkes; and it is not ſurprizing that Churchill's muſe ſhould be awakened in the cauſe of his friend. The Duelliſt has many poetical beau-

" O'er lands, where former ages ſaw
" Reaſon and Truth the only Law,
" Where Arts and Arms, and Public Love
" In gen'rous emulation ſtrove,
" Where Kings were proud of legal ſway,
" And Subjects happy to obey,
" Tho' now in ſlav'ry ſunk, and broke
" To Superſtition's galling yoke,
" Of Arts, of Arms, no more they tell,
" Or Freedom, which with Science fell.
" By Tyrants aw'd, who never find
" The paſſage to their people's mind,
" To whom the joy was never known
" Of planting in the heart their throne,
" Far from all proſpect of relief,
" Their hours in fruitleſs pray'rs and grief,
" For loſs of bleſſings they employ,
" Which WE unthankfully enjoy (23)."

(23) Ibid. p. 16, 17.

We ſhall add the author's humorous ridicule of the trite reflections which ſometimes are found in poetry.

" Ah, woeful me! Ah, woeful Man!
" Ah! woeful All, do all we can!
" Who can on earthly things depend
" From one to t'other moment's end?
" HONOUR, WIT, GENIUS, WEALTH, and GLORY,
" Good lack! good lack! are tranſitory,
" Nothing is ſure and ſtable found,
" The very Earth itſelf turns round.
" Monarchs, nay MINISTERS muſt die,
" Muſt rot, muſt ſtink—Ah, me! ah, why!
" Cities themſelves in Time decay,
" 'ſ Cities thus—Ah, well-a-day!
" If Brick and Mortar have an end,
" On what can Fleſh and Blood depend!
" Ah woeful me! Ah woeful Man!
" Ah woeful All, do All we can! (24)."

(24) Ibid. p. 19, 20.

Though the fourth book has in it ſome ſplendid paſſages, it is, in general, very wild and irregular; and Mr. Churchill ſeems almoſt entirely to have loſt ſight of his ſubject. Through the whole poem he has copiouſly indulged himſelf in perſonal ſatire. But whatever poetical merit there may be in his characters of this kind, we have not choſen to inſert them; being deſirous, as much as poſſible, to avoid making the Biographia the record of private enmity.

[H] One of the moſt ſtriking paſſages of the Conference is that, &c.] The lines to which we refer are theſe:

" Ah! what, my Lord, hath private life to do
" With things of public nature? why to view
" Would you thus cruelly thoſe ſcenes unfold,
" Which, without pain and horror to behold,
" Muſt ſpeak me ſomething more, or leſs than man;
" Which Friends may pardon, but I never can?
" Look back! a thought which borders on deſpair,
" Which human nature muſt, yet cannot bear.
" 'Tis not the babbling of a buſy world,
" Where praiſe and cenſure are at random hurl'd,
" Which can the meaneſt of my thoughts controul,
" Or ſhake one ſettled purpoſe of my ſoul.
" Free and at large might their wild curſes roam,
" If All, if All alas! were well at home.
" No—'tis the tale which angry Conſcience tells,
" When ſhe with more than tragic horror ſwells
" Each circumſtance of guilt; when ſtern, but true,
" She brings bad actions forth into review;
" And, like the dread hand-writing on the wall,
" Bids late Remorſe awake at Reaſon's call,
" Arm'd at all points bids Scorpion Vengeance paſs,
" And to the mind holds up Reflection's glaſs,
" The mind, which ſtarting, heaves the heart-felt groan,
" And hates that form ſhe knows to be her own (25)."

ties [I]. It is more conciſe than the Ghoſt, more correct, more directly to the purpoſe; though one principal object of it was to ſatirize other perſons, beſides Mr. Martin.

Mr. Churchill's laſt publication in 1763, ſeems to have been "The Author," and it is one of the moſt pleaſing of his productions [K]. The former part of it is not remarkably

[I] The Duelliſt has many poetical beauties.] We ſhall only point out two or three paſſages. The beginning of the firſt book is very ſtriking, and has ſome fine proſopopeias. No one can deny that the following lines are truly poetical, whatever may be thought by ſome perſons of the purpoſe to which they are applied.

" Dark was the Night, by Fate decreed
" For the contrivance of a deed
" More black than common, which might make
" This land from her foundations ſhake,
" Might tear up Freedom from the root,

(p) Lloyd's Poetical works, vol. ii. p. 94.

Nearly at the time when the laſt book of the Ghoſt appeared, Mr. Churchill publiſhed " The Conference," in which he returned to his uſual meaſure of verſe, the heroic, being the meaſure wherein he moſt excelled; though he had lately begun to introduce into it too many proſaic lines. The plan of the poem is ſimilar to that of one of Pope's ſatires. A dialogue is ſuppoſed to be carried on between the Author and a noble Lord, who is repreſented as giving him much good worldly advice, to which he anſwers with great ſpirit, and in his replies indulges his ſatiric vein with no ſmall degree of freedom. One of the moſt ſtriking paſſages in the Conference is that in which he expreſſes the deepeſt contrition for a recent action of his life, that was indeed highly to his diſhonour [H]. He had ſeduced and carried off the daughter of a tradeſman in Weſtminſter. In a little more than a fortnight his paſſion ſubſided, and the young woman became very ſorry for her crime. Accordingly, a wiſe and judicious friend wrote for her a letter to her father, expreſſive of her penitence, and of her deſire to return home. Her father, with equal tenderneſs and prudence, received her into his houſe; and ſhe might have been fully reſtored to a virtuous conduct, had it not been for the ſeverity of an elder ſiſter, who was continually loading her with reproaches. Wearied with this uſage, ſhe applied to Churchill, offering to return to him again; which he thought himſelf bound to admit, by the ideas he entertained of gratitude and honour. The true point of virtue would have been, to have provided, as amply as he could, for the young woman's ſupport, and to have had no criminal connexion with her in future.

Our Author's next poem, if we miſtake not, was " The Duelliſt," in three books, written in verſes of eight ſyllables. The occaſion of the work is well known, being Mr. Martin's challenge to Mr. Wilkes; and it is not ſurprizing that Churchill's muſe ſhould be awakened in the cauſe of his friend. The Duelliſt has many poetical beau-

We ſhall add the author's humorous ridicule of the trite reflections which ſometimes are found in poetry.

" Ah, woeful me! Ah, woeful Man!
" Ah! woeful All, do all we can!
" Who can on earthly things depend
" From one to t'other moment's end?
" HONOUR, WIT, GENIUS, WEALTH, and GLORY,
" Good lack! good lack! are tranſitory,

" On what can Fleſh and Blood depend!
" Ah woeful me! Ah woeful Man!
(24) Ibid. p. 19, 20. " Ah woeful All, do All we can! (24)."

Though the fourth book has in it ſome ſplendid paſſages, it is, in general, very wild and irregular; and Mr. Churchill ſeems almoſt entirely to have loſt ſight of his ſubject. Through the whole poem he has copiouſly indulged himſelf in perſonal ſatire. But whatever poetical merit there may be in his characters of this kind, we have not choſen to inſert them; being deſirous, as much as poſſible, to avoid making the Biographia the record of private enmity.

[H] One of the moſt ſtriking paſſages of the Conference is that, &c.] The lines to which we refer are theſe:

" Ah! what, my Lord, hath private life to do
" With things of public nature? why to view
" Would you thus cruelly thoſe ſcenes unfold,
" Which, without pain and horror to behold,
" Muſt ſpeak me ſomething more, or leſs than man;
" Which Friends may pardon, but I never can?
" Look back! a thought which borders on deſpair,
" Which human nature muſt, yet cannot bear.
" 'Tis not the babbling of a buſy world,
" Where praiſe and cenſure are at random hurl'd,
" Which can the meaneſt of my thoughts controul,
" Or ſhake one ſettled purpoſe of my ſoul:
" Free and at large might their wild curſes roam,
" If All, if All alas! were well at home.
" No—'tis the tale which angry Conſcience tells,
" When ſhe with more than tragic horror ſwells
" Each circumſtance of guilt; when ſtern, but true,
" She brings bad actions forth into review;
" And, like the dread hand-writing on the wall,
" Bids late Remorſe awake at Reaſon's call,
" Arm'd at all points bids Scorpion Vengeance paſs,
" And to the mind holds up Reflection's glaſs,
" The mind, which ſtarting, heaves the heart-felt groan,
" And hates that form ſhe knows to be her own (25)." (25) Churchill's work, vol. ii. p. 159, 162.

There is great dignity both of ſentiment and language in the following verſes:

" What's

bly ſatirical; but, towards the concluſion, the Poet is extremely ſevere againſt certain writers of the time, eſpecially ſome political writers. The character of Kidgell, the Informer, is drawn in a maſterly manner. The opinion of the Monthly Reviewers concerning this Poem was, that it was the moſt agreeable and the moſt unexceptionable of all Mr. Churchill's performances, whether they conſidered the tendency of the ſubject, or the execution. "The intereſts," ſay they, "of genius and learning are cordially "eſpouſed, and powerfully ſupported, while the contempt of profeſſed ignorance, and "the ſhallowneſs of pretenders to ſcience, are juſtly expoſed, and laſhed by the blameleſs rod of general ſatire." Even with regard to the ſatirical ſtrokes of a private nature, the critics add, that if the cenſure be juſt, they ſcarcely know how to blame it (q). The Critical Reviewers, though they had been involved in a conteſt with our bard, gave a like teſtimony on this occaſion. "It is but juſtice," they obſerve, "to "Mr. Churchill to acknowledge, that his reputation as a Poet ſeems to riſe and in"creaſe with every performance." The "Conference" was much ſuperior to the "Ghoſt," and the "Author" is in our opinion, a better poem than the "Conference." "The ſentiments throughout are, for the moſt part, noble and manly, the ſatire finely "pointed, the expreſſion ſtrong and nervous (r)."

(q) Monthly Review, vol. xxx. p. 26, 27.

Churchill's poetical career for 1764 began with the firſt book of his "Gotham," which was conſidered by the generality of readers as ſo ſtrange and irregular a production, that they could not tell what judgment to form of the writer's intention. As he proceeded in the work, he appeared to greater advantage; and it became manifeſt from the ſecond and third books, that it was his chief deſign, under the idea of his being proclaimed King of Gotham, to repreſent the real duty of a Monarch; in which view much good inſtruction is conveyed. This performance is leſs ſatirical than moſt of our Author's pieces. Upon the whole, Gotham is not one of the pleaſanteſt of his poems, though it contains a number of beautiful paſſages [L].

(r) Critical Review, vol. xvi. p. 446. Upon reflection, we have ſome ſuſpicion that the "Author" was publiſhed a little before the "Duelliſt." But if we have been guilty of an error in our arrangement of the account of the two poems, it is an error of no great conſequence.

Churchill's

"What's in this name of Lord, that I ſhould fear

(31) Churchill's works, vol. iii. p. 9—12.

The firſt book of Gotham, notwithſtanding its faults, is far from being deſtitute of imagination. The buſineſs and labour of a Poet are well deſcribed at the beginning of the ſecond book.

" Little do ſuch men know the toil, the pains,
" The daily, nightly racking of the brains,
" To range the thoughts, the matter to digeſt,
" To cull fit phraſes, and reject the reſt,
" To know the times when HUMOUR, on the cheek
" Of MIRTH may hold her ſports, when WIT ſhould ſpeak,
" And when be ſilent; when to uſe the pow'rs
" Of Ornament, and how to place the flow'rs,
" So that they neither give a tawdry glare,
" Nor waſte their ſweetneſs in the deſart air;
" To form (which few can do, and ſcarcely one,
" One Critick in an age can find, when done)
" To form a plan, to ſtrike a grand Outline,
" To fill it up, and make the picture ſhine
" A full, and perfect piece; to make coy rime
" Renounce her follies, and with ſenſe keep time,
" To make proud ſenſe againſt her nature bend,
" And wear the chains of rime, yet call her friend (32)."

(32) Ibid. p. 26.

The author's account of his own manner of writing will juſtify the ſtrictures we are ſometimes obliged to make upon his productions.

" Had I the pow'r, I could not have the time,
" Whilſt ſpirits flow, and life is in her prime,
" Without a ſin 'gainſt Pleaſure, to deſign
" A plan, to methodize each thought, each line
" Highly to finiſh, and make ev'ry grace,
" In itſelf charming, take new charms from place.
" Nothing of Books, and little known of Men,
" When the mad fit comes on, I ſeize the pen,
" Rough as they run, the rapid thoughts ſet down,
" Rough as they run, diſcharge them on the Town.
" Hence rude, unfiniſh'd brats, before their time,
" Are born into this idle world of rime,
" And the poor ſlattern MUSE is brought to bed
" With all her imperfections on her head.
" Some, as no life appears, no pulſes play
" Through the dull, dubious maſs, no breath makes way,
" Doubt, greatly doubt, 'till for a glaſs they call,
" Whether the Child can be baptiz'd at all.
" Others, on other grounds, objections frame,
" And, granting that the child may have a name,
" Doubt, as the Sex might well a midwife poſe,
" Whether they ſhould baptize it, Verſe or Proſe (33)."

(33) Ibid. p. 33, 34.

Though there are many fine lines, and ſome happy ſtrokes of fancy, in the ſecond book of Gotham, it cannot be denied that there is in it too great a neglect of poetic numbers. In the beginning of the third book the verſification is more correct and harmonious, and towards the middle of it Mr. Churchill diſplays a happy vein of poetry. His account of the duty of a King is well conceived and expreſſed.

" To ſtill the voice of diſcord in the land,
" To make weak faction's diſcontented band,
" Detected, weak, and crumbling to decay,
" With hunger pinch'd, on their own vitals prey;
" Like brethren, in the ſelf-ſame int'reſts warm'd,
" Like diff'rent bodies, with one ſoul inform'd,
" To make a nation, nobly rais'd above
" All meaner thought, grow up in common love;
" To give the laws due vigour, and to hold
" That ſacred balance, temperate, yet bold,
" With ſuch an equal hand, that thoſe who fear
" May yet approve, and own my juſtice clear;
" To be a Common Father, to ſecure
" The weak from violence, from pride the poor;
" Vice, and her ſons, to baniſh in diſgrace,
" To make Corruption dread to ſhew her face,
" To bid afflicted Virtue take new ſtate,
" And be, at laſt, acquainted with the great;
" Of all Religions to elect the beſt,
" Nor let her prieſts be made a ſtanding jeſt;
" Rewards for Worth, with lib'ral hand to carve,
" To love the Arts, nor let the Artiſts ſtarve;
" To make fair Plenty through the realm increaſe,
" Give Fame in War, and Happineſs in Peace,
" To ſee my people virtuous, great and free,
" And know that all thoſe bleſſings flow from me,
" O 'tis a joy too exquiſite, a thought
" Which flatters Nature more than flatt'ry ought.
" 'Tis a great, glorious taſk, for Man too hard,
" But not leſs great, leſs glorious the reward,
" The beſt reward which here to Man is giv'n,
" 'Tis more than Earth, and little ſhort of Heav'n;
" A taſk (if ſuch compariſon may be)
" The ſame in nature, diff'ring in degree,
" Like that which God, on whom for aid I call,
" Performs with eaſe, and yet performs to all (34)."

(34) Ibid. p. 60—62.

We cannot refuſe ourſelves the pleaſure of tranſcribing the beautiful lines in which our author diſplays his love for poetry, when, as ſuppoſing himſelf King of Gotham, he is obliged to take his farewell of the Muſes.

" Farewell ye MUSES too—for ſuch mean things
" Muſt not preſume to dwell with mighty Kings—
" Farewell ye MUSES—tho' it cuts my heart
" E'en to the quick, we muſt for ever part.
" When the freſh Morn bade luſty Nature wake;
" When the Birds, ſweetly twitt'ring thro' the brake,
" Tun'd their ſoft pipes; when from the neighb'ring bloom,
" Sipping the dew, each Zephyr ſtole perfume;
" When all things with new vigour were inſpir'd,
" And ſeem'd to ſay they never could be tir'd;
" How often have we ſtray'd, whilſt ſportive Rime
" Deceiv'd the way, and clipp'd the wings of Time,
" O'er hill, o'er dale! how often laugh'd to ſee,
" Yourſelves made viſible to none but me,
" The clown, his Work ſuſpended, gape and ſtare,
" And ſeem'd to think that I convers'd with Air!
" When the Sun, beating on the parched ſoil,
" Seem'd to proclaim an interval of toil,
" When a faint languor crept thro' ev'ry breaſt,
" And things moſt us'd to labour, wiſh'd for reſt,
" How often, underneath a rev'rend oak,
" Where ſafe, and fearleſs of the impious ſtroke,
" Some ſacred DRYAD liv'd, or in ſome grove,
" Where with capricious fingers Fancy wove
" Her fairy bow'r, whilſt NATURE all the while
" Look'd on, and view'd her mock'ries with a ſmile,
" Have we held converſe ſweet! how often laid,
" Faſt by the Thames, in HAM's inſpiring ſhade,
" Amongſt thoſe Poets, which make up your train,
" And, after death, pour forth the ſacred Strain,
" Have I, at your command, in verſe grown grey,
" But not impair'd, heard DRYDEN tune that lay,
" Which might have drawn an Angel from his ſphere,
" And kept him from his office liſt'ning here.
" When dreary NIGHT, with MORPHEUS in her train,
" Led on by SILENCE to reſume her reign,
" With Darkneſs covering, as with a robe,
" This ſcene of Levity, blank'd half the globe,
" How oft', enchanted with your heav'nly ſtrains,
" Which ſtole me from myſelf, which in ſoft chains
" Of Muſic bound my ſoul, how oft' have I,
" Sounds more than human floating thro' the Sky, wich for the High-Stewardſhip of the Univerſity of Cambridge. The beginning of the poem is very ſpirited; and the words, "Come PANEGYRICK," introduce one of the ſevereſt ſatires, which the pen of man ever wrote, againſt a Nobleman who has, indeed, often been the ſubject of ſatire; perhaps ſo much as to be indifferent and careleſs about the attacks that are made on his character. "The Candidate" was ſucceeded by "The Farewell," wherein the Poet is repreſented as having formed a deſign to quit his native land, from which his friend endeavours to diſſuade him. Though there is much good ſenſe in this performance, and ſeveral excellent obſervations on philoſophy, and the love of our country, it cannot be conſidered as one of our Author's chief works. It is deficient in poetical fire, and many of the lines are feeble and proſaic. Partly from a confidence in the good opinion of his admirers, and partly from the neceſſity of obtaining frequent pecuniary ſupplies, Mr. Churchill now became too negligent and rapid in his publications. In his ſucceeding production, entitled, "The Times," he diſplays his uſual vigour and ſpirit. The characters of Faber and Apicius, whoever were intended by them, are drawn with equal ſtrength and ſeverity. The ſatire of the poem is principally directed againſt an unnatural vice, which is expoſed with an energy and indignation that cannot poſſibly be exceeded. The matter is, indeed, carried to the very height of extravagance; but this extravagance ſhews, at the ſame time, the wonderful powers of the Author's mind, and his juſt and boundleſs deteſtation of the crime againſt which his poetry is levelled.

Churchill's next publication was "Independence," a poem which does not, in every part of it, diſplay the vigour of imagination that is apparent in ſome of his performances; and it is, alſo, chargeable with the fault we have more than once had occaſion to touch upon, the fault of careleſs verſification. It contains, however, ſeveral ſhining paſſages; and a ſtrong vein of good ſenſe runs through the whole. Much is ſaid in it of Poets and Patrons; perhaps as much as the ſubject will well bear. The Author hath admirably repreſented the ſtriking contraſt between an effeminate Lord and himſelf; and hath drawn his own picture with great humour [M]. "Independence" was followed by "The Journey," a ſhort poem, which reflects no diſgrace on our Author's abilities. The advice of his friends and his anſwer to it are well conducted. Towards the concluſion, he indulges himſelf in ſatirizing ſeveral contemporary Poets. Mr. Churchill's laſt poetical production was the dedication of his Sermons to Biſhop Warburton, which is written with his uſual ſeverity againſt that eminent Prelate. Some parts of it are very ſpirited, and eſpecially thoſe paſſages which begin with, "HEALTH to great "Gloſter." If the ſame vigour is not maintained through the whole, it may be obſerved, that, as the poem was left unfiniſhed, in conſequence of the Author's deceaſe, we cannot tell to what height the grave irony of the ſatire might have been carried.

With

With reſpect to the Sermons, which are ten in number, two upon the nature of prayer in general, and eight upon our Lord's Prayer, there certainly could be no other reaſon for publiſhing them than to obtain the benefit of a large ſubſcription. The preſent Biographer, that he might be able to form an exact judgment, hath, with exemplary patience, read them all; and he is obliged to pronounce concerning them, that they are written with an uniform mediocrity; and if he were to add dulneſs, he would not be far from the truth. There is no animation in the diſcourſes; nor could a ſingle paſſage be ſelected from them, which diſplays the fire of genius, or the force of imagination. The ſentiments are practical, and not uſually to be found fault with; but there is not a thought that is new, or which indicates any peculiar ſtrength of conception. The ſtyle is perſpicuous, without the leaſt pretenſions to elegance. There is a dull formality in it, and we often meet with the words, thereto, therefrom, herefrom, whereof, hereunto, and others of a like kind. The Sermons have all the air as if they had been compoſed by ſome plain Clergyman in the beginning of the century. On the whole, we have no idea that Mr. Churchill could have been the Author of them; for ſurely whatever came from his pen muſt have manifeſted ſome traces of the natural vigour and acuteneſs of his mind. He probably found them in his father's cloſet.

In the latter end of the year 1764, our Poet went to France, to pay a viſit to his friend Mr. Wilkes, who was then in that kingdom. Mr. Humphrey Cotes was of the party. They met at Boulogne, where Mr. Churchill was ſeized with a miliary fever, which baffled the medical aid of two Phyſicians of ſkill and reputation by whom he was attended. Mr. Cotes, who was a great advocate for Dr. James's Powder, inſiſted upon applying it; to which the Phyſicians conſented, but ſaid, that the battle was loſt. They obſerved, at the ſame time, that if the powder produced any favourable effect, it would operate as a cathartic, or by perſpiration; but that if it acted as an emetic, (which was in fact the caſe) the patient would be immediately carried off. The event correſponded with their prediction, and Mr. Churchill departed this life on the fourth of authority, hath related, that Churchill's laſt words were, What a fool have I been! Though he might, on ſeveral accounts, have had too much cauſe to make ſuch a reflection, it is not true that it was made by him. This we have been aſſured of by Mr. Wilkes, whoſe teſtimony upon the ſubject muſt be deciſive; and the ſame Gentleman hath informed the world, that the goodneſs of Churchill's heart and the firmneſs of his philoſophy were in full luſtre during the whole time of his very ſevere illneſs; and that the amazing faculties of his mind were not in the leaſt impaired till a few moments before his death (u). (u) New Foundling Hoſpital for Wit, Part the third, p. 91.
(s) 1764. November (s), at Boulogne, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. When the violence of the diſorder threatened his diſſolution, the Phyſicians, according to the law of France, were obliged to acquaint the Church with his danger, that the Prieſts might attend to perform their ſpiritual functions, and eſpecially, as being a Proteſtant, to uſe their endeavours for his converſion. Accordingly, they again and again demanded admiſſion for this purpoſe; but Mr. Wilkes, with that politeneſs, addreſs, and good ſenſe which he is ſo well known to poſſeſs, parried their attempts, and prevented them from troubling his dying friend. Mr. Davies, in his Life of Garrick (t), upon what he thinks good (t) Vol. I. p. 319.
The deceaſe of a man of ſo much celebrity, and of ſuch popularity with a large part of the nation, could not be received with indifference; eſpecially conſidering the early period of his life, and the ſhort courſe of fame which he had run. He was greatly lamented by his acquaintance and admirers; but no one was ſo deeply affected with his death as Robert Lloyd. The news of the melancholy event being announced to him ſomewhat abruptly, while he was ſitting at dinner, he was ſeized with a ſudden ſickneſs, and ſaying "I ſhall follow poor Charles," took to his bed, from which he never roſe again (w). Beſides Churchill's great perſonal friendſhip for Lloyd, he had been remarkably generous to him during his confinement in the Fleet, having all that time allowed him a regular ſtipend (x). Such was, at firſt, the enthuſiaſm in favour of Mr. Churchill's memory, that there was a talk of erecting a monument to him in Weſtminſter Abbey [N]; but the idea ſoon ſubſided, and will ſcarcely ever be revived. The following inſcription, in the cloſe ſtyle of the ancients, and engraven on a ſepulchral urn of alabaſter, was drawn up by Mr. Wilkes, and intended by him to give the true character of our Author, as a friend, a poet, and a patriot.

(x) Ibid. p. xxvi. note.

[N] There was a talk of erecting a monument to him in Weſtminſter Abbey.] In the beginning of the year 1765, a publication appeared, entitled, "Verſes on "the Report of a Monument to be erected in Weſt-"minſter Abbey, to the Memory of a late Au-"thor:" To which was prefixed, an Extract of a Letter to a Perſon of Quality. The ſame verſes, with the letter by which they were accompanied, made a part, in 1766, of "Poems on ſeveral Subjects, by "James Beattie, M. A." now the celebrated Dr. Beattie. We are informed, that in the ſucceeding editions of the Doctor's poems theſe verſes are omitted; and it is much to his honour that this is the caſe. He never in his life better conſulted his reputation, than in expunging from his works the lines in queſtion. He had ſtill more conſulted his reputation, if he had never ſuffered them to be publiſhed. The ſincere regard we have for Dr. Beattie's general character and writings hath inſpired us with pleaſure, that, by his prudent conduct, he hath afforded us an opportunity of ſuppreſſing ſome remarks which we ſhould otherwiſe have thought ourſelves under a neceſſity of making.

Our opinion of Churchill, as a poet, is ſufficiently apparent from what hath already been ſaid. That he had great force of genius cannot juſtly be denied; and there are ſcarcely any of his performances in which the natural vigour of his mind is not in ſome inſtances diſplayed. It muſt, at the ſame time, be acknowledged, that he is very unequal in his compoſitions. Writing from a ſpirit of party, being deſirous of gratifying the eagerneſs of his admirers, and having a view to his cuſtomary tax of half a crown for each of his publications, he was too rapid in ſending them into the world, and too ſolicitous to fill up the quantity of pages expected from him, to attend to the neceſſary art of blotting. In his verſification there is ſometimes ſuch a looſeneſs of contexture, as brings to our memory Oldham and ſeveral of the poets of the laſt century; whilſt at other times he amply ſhews how well he underſtood all the power of ſtrong and harmonious numbers. If his life had been protracted, if he had been placed in an independent ſituation, if he could have united application with leiſure, he might have been capable of producing ſome grand work, which would have reſcued his name for ever from oblivion. Should it be thought that a few of his friends have extolled him beyond his merit [O], it muſt be allowed that by many perſons he was unduly depretiated. He hath afforded a remarkable inſtance of a ſudden and ſhort-lived celebrity, and of a more than uſual rapidity in the neglect paid to his writings. Perhaps nothing will revive the memory of them, ſo as to cauſe them to be again generally read, excepting a new edition with notes, fully explaining the ſatirical and hiſtorical alluſions. This was what Mr. Churchill himſelf, before his deceaſe, wiſhed to be done. In his Will is the following paſſage: " I deſire my dear friend, John Wilkes, Eſq; to collect and publiſh my " Works with the remarks and explanations he has prepared, and any others he thinks " proper to make (z)." Whether Mr. Wilkes will ever have leiſure or inclination to comply with this requeſt, we are not able to ſay. Perhaps the time is not yet arrived for taking away the veil from certain objects; and perhaps it may never be deſirable to (z) Monthly Review, vol. xli. p. 380. note.

[O] Have extolled him beyond his merit.] It will not be thought ſurprizing, that Mr. Lloyd ſhould be very warm in the praiſes of his friend. In a poetical epiſtle to Charles Churchill, he thus expreſſes himſelf:

" Yet, in theſe leaden times, this idle age,
" When, blind with dulneſs, or as blind with rage,
" Author 'gainſt author rails with venom curſt,
" And happy He who calls out blockhead firſt;
" From the low earth aſpiring genius ſprings,
" And fails triumphant, borne on eagle wings.
" No toothleſs ſpleen, no venom'd critic's aim,
" Shall rob thee, Churchill, of thy proper fame;
" While hitch'd for ever in thy nervous rime,
" Fool lives, and ſhines out fool to lateſt time (38)."

(38) Lloyd's Poetical works, vol. i. p. 86.

In another of his poems, Lloyds pays Churchill a compliment which will, perhaps, be deemed more fine than juſt.

" Authors, as DRYDEN's maxim runs,
" Have what he calls poetic ſons.
" Thus MILTON, more correctly wild,
" Was richer SPENSER's lawful child.
" And CHURCHILL, got on all the nine,
" Is DRYDEN's heir in ev'ry line (39)."

(39) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 11.

We ſhall add one more inſtance of Lloyd's admiration of his friend.

" Is there a man, whoſe genius ſtrong,
" Rolls like a rapid ſtream along,
" Whoſe Muſe, long hid in chearleſs night,
" Pours on us like a flood of light,
" Whoſe acting comprehenſive mind
" Walks Fancy's regions, unconfin'd;
" Whom, nor the ſurly ſenſe of pride,
" Nor affectation, warps aſide;
" Who drags no author from his ſhelf,
" To talk on with an eye to ſelf;
" Careleſs alike, in converſation,
" Of cenſure, or of approbation;
" Who freely thinks, and freely ſpeaks,
" And meets the Wit he never ſeeks;
" Whoſe reaſon calm, and judgment cool,
" Can pity, but not hate a fool;
" Who can a hearty praiſe beſtow,
" If merit ſparkles in a foe;
" Who bold and open, firm and true,
" Flatters no friends--yet loves them too:
" CHURCHILL will be the laſt to know
" His is the portrait, I would ſhow (40)."

(40) Ibid. p. 31, 32.

Other writers, as might be expected, are more ſparing in their applauſe of Churchill. Mr. Knox, in an Eſſay on Satire and Satiriſts, hath thus delineated our author's character. " Even Young, popu" lar as he was, has been eclipſed by a Poet who has
" ſhone with the effulgence and the inſtability of a " meteor. Churchill poſſeſſed merit; a merit which " was magnified, when ſeen through the medium of " party, beyond that degree which it was able to " ſupport. When reaſon at laſt viewed what paſſion
" had exaggerated, ſhe was diſguſted with the diſ-
" appointment, and turned away with neglect.
" Thus the celebrated Churchill, with whoſe ap-
" plauſe the town re-echoed, is ſinking to an obli" vion which he hardly deſerves: for though he " wrote many careleſs lines and many dull paſſages,
" yet the greater part of his productions diſplayed a " genuine vein of ſatirical genius (41)." Dr. Joſeph Warton hath not highly complimented our Poet, when he ſays, " We all remember when even a " Churchill was more in vogue than Gray. He that " treats of faſhionable follies, and the topics of the " day, that deſcribes preſent perſons and recent " events, finds many perſons, whoſe underſtandings
" and whoſe paſſions he gratifies (42)." In the fiftieth volume of the Gentleman's Magazine, is an eſſay, in verſe, on Charles Churchill (43).

revive party matters, which, though not ſunk into oblivion, have happily ceaſed to inflame the paſſions of the mind.

Few of Mr. Churchill's juvenile pieces have made their way to the preſs. Some of them are to be met with in a periodical work, entitled "The Library," which was publiſhed a little more than twenty years ago; and the poetical department of which was conducted, for ſeveral months, by our Author and his friend Lloyd. Six of Churchill's Letters to Mr. Wilkes are in the collection printed by that gentleman in 1769. Our poet was a moſt ardent admirer of Dryden, but had contracted an enmity to Pope. The reaſons of it, which are fully aſſigned in the publication juſt referred to, do not appear to be ſatisfactory (a). A ſincere regard to Pope is not inconſiſtent with the moſt zealous admiration of Dryden. Mr. Churchill left two ſons, the youngeſt of whom was generouſly educated at the expence of Doctor, now Sir Richard Jebb, Baronet.

The ſubject of this article was ſent to the free-ſchool at Grantham in Lincolnſhire, in 1682, when he was little more than ten years of age. He continued at this ſchool till he had gone through it, from the loweſt form to the higheſt: and he informs us himſelf, that ſuch learning as this ſchool afforded, was the moſt that he could pretend to, and which was not afterwards much improved by ſtudy (c). He was taken from hence, about the year 1687, in order to ſtand at the election of boys to be received into Wincheſter-College, where his father hoped he would have been admitted [B], on [A] His father, Caius Gabriel Cibber, was a native of Holſtein, &c.] Mr. Walpole ſays, 'Caius Gabriel 'Cibber, or Cibert, ſon of a cabinet-maker to the 'King of Denmark, was born at Flenſburg in the 'Duchy of Holſtein, and diſcovering a talent for 'ſculpture was ſent, at the King's expence, to Rome. '—He came to England, not long before the Reſ'toration, and worked for John Stone, ſon of 'Nicholas, who going to Holland, and being ſeized 'with a palſy, Cibber his foreman was ſent to con'duct him home (1).' He afterwards became carver to the King's Cloſet. He was twice married. It was his ſecond wife who was the mother of the ſubject of this article. The moſt capital of his works 'are the two figures of melancholy and raving mad'neſs before the front of Bethlehem. The bas-reliefs 'on two ſides of the monument are by his hand too. 'So are the fountain in Soho-Square, and one of the 'fine vaſes at Hampton-Court, ſaid to be done in 'competition with a foreigner who executed the 'other, but nobody has told us which is Cibber's. 'He carved moſt of the ſtatues of Kings round the 'Royal-Exchange, as far as King Charles; and that 'of Sir Thomas Greſham in the piazza beneath. 'The firſt Duke of Devonſhire employed him much 'at Chatſworth; where two ſphinxes on large baſes, 'well executed, and with ornaments in good taſte, 'are of his work, and till very lately there was a 'ſtatue of Neptune in a fountain, ſtill better. He 'carved there ſeveral door-caſes of alabaſter with 'rich foliage, and many ornaments in the chapel; 'and on each ſide of the altar is a ſtatue by him, 'Faith and Hope: the draperies have great merit, 'but the airs of the heads are not ſo good as that 'of the Neptune. Cibber built the Daniſh Church 'in London, and was buried there himſelf, with his 'ſecond wife, for whom a monument was erected in '1696 (2).' He died himſelf about the year 1700, at the age of ſeventy (3).

[B] Where his father hoped he would have been admitted.] He ſays, in his own account of his life, 'My father, who knew little how the world was to 'be dealt with, imagined my having that advantage, '(of being deſcended from William of Wykeham) 'would be ſecurity enough for my ſucceſs, and ſo 'ſent me ſimply down thither, without the leaſt fa'vourable recommendation or intereſt, but that of 'my naked merit, and a pompous pedigree in my 'packet. Had he tacked a direction to my back, 'and ſent me by the carrier to the Mayor of the 'town, to be choſen Member of Parliament there, 'I might have had juſt as much chance to have ſuc'ceeded in the one, as the other (4).' But he adds, that the want of ſucceſs in his own caſe, occaſioned his father to take afterwards a more judicious method of procuring an election at Wincheſter, in favour of his brother Lewis Cibber, and of whom he alſo relates ſome farther particulars. 'The experience,' ſays he, 'which my father then bought, at my coſt, 'taught him, ſome years after, to take a more judi'cious care of my younger brother, Lewis Cibber, 'whom, with the preſent of a ſtatue of the founder, 'of his own making, he recommended to the ſame 'College. This ſtatue now ſtands, I think, over 'the ſchool door there, and was ſo well executed, 'that it ſeemed to ſpeak—for its kinſman. It was 'no ſooner ſet up, than the door of preferment was 'open to him. Here, one would think, my brother 'had the advantage of me, in the favour of fortune, 'by this his firſt laudable ſtep into the world. I 'own, I was ſo proud of his ſucceſs, that I even va'lued myſelf upon it; and yet it is but a melancholy 'reflection to obſerve, how unequally his profeſſion 'and mine were provided for; when I, who had 'been the outcaſt of fortune, could find means, from 'my income of the Theatre, before I was my own 'maſter there, to ſupply, in his higheſt preferment, 'his common neceſſities. I cannot part with his 'memory without telling you, I had as ſincere a con'cern for this brother's well-being, as my own. He 'had lively parts, and more than ordinary learning, 'with a good deal of natural wit and humour; but, 'from too great a diſregard of his health, he died a 'Fellow of New College in Oxford, ſoon after he 'had been ordained by Dr. Compton, then Biſhop 'of London (5).'

account of his being deſcended, by the mother's ſide, from William of Wykeham, the founder. But in this he was unſucceſsful, for want of proper recommendations. The father felt ſome diſappointment on the occaſion: but the ſon, who was naturally chearful and volatile, and averſe to reſtraint, was delighted to find that he had obtained a reprieve from the confined life of a ſchool-boy. The very ſame day, on which the election had decided him to be an unſucceſsful candidate, he rode poſt to London, that he might have time enough to ſee a play, before his mother ſhould be able to require of him an account of his travelling expences (d). About this time he imbibed a ſtrong inclination for the ſtage, but concealed it from his father, to whom he knew it would give great offence. He, therefore, as he expreſſes it, "ſuppreſſed the bewitching ideas of ſo "ſublime a ſtation," and wrote to his father, who was then employed at Chatſworth, informing him of his diſinclination to wait another year for an uncertain admiſſion at Wincheſter, and requeſting him to ſend him immediately to the univerſity. His father, who was, as he informs us, naturally indulgent to him, wrote him word, that as ſoon as his affairs would permit, he would go with him himſelf, and ſettle him in ſome College; but that he preferred the Univerſity of Cambridge, becauſe he had reſided there for ſome time, having been employed in making ſome ſtatues for Trinity-College library, where he had contracted ſome acquaintance with the Heads of Houſes, who might aſſiſt him in his intentions in favour of his ſon (e). But after ſome months were elapſed, being unwilling that his ſon ſhould be too long inactive in London, where he probably conſidered him as much expoſed to temptation, he ſent for him down to Chatſworth, that he might be under his own eye, till he ſhould be at leiſure to go with him to Cambridge. Some events, however, afterwards took place, which entirely prevented his being educated for the Church [C], for which his father had intended him. Before he ſet out on his journey to Chatſworth, information was received in London, that the Prince of Orange had landed in the Weſt of England, and was at the head of an army there: and when young Cibber arrived at Nottingham, he found his father in arms there, among thoſe forces which the Earl of Devonſhire had raiſed in ſupport of the liberties of the nation. But the old man, having little inclination for a military life, and being from his age ill qualified to endure its fatigues, entreated the Earl of Devonſhire to accept of his ſon in his room, and to permit him to return to finiſh the works which he had undertaken to execute at Chatſworth. To this his lordſhip readily conſented, and alſo promiſed, that when affairs were ſettled, he would provide for his ſon. Young Cibber now engaged in the profeſſion of a ſoldier with great alacrity; but the manner in which the revolution was happily effected, gave him no opportunity of trying or exhibiting his courage. He marched, however, with the other troops [D] raiſed by the Earl of Devonſhire, from Nottingham to Oxford, where they continued for ſome weeks, and afterwards were remanded again to Nottingham. After the revolution, he entirely quitted the military life, and had ſome proſpect of obtaining preferment of a different kind by the intereſt of the Earl of Devonſhire: but this was prevented by the vehement deſire which he had formed of becoming an actor [E], which he had preferred to every other profeſſion. Accordingly in 1689 (f), he became a player at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane; though he did not at firſt meet with much encouragement, being full three quarters of a year upon the ſtage, or at leaſt an attendant at the theatre, before he was admitted to a ſalary of ten ſhillings a week (g). He thought himſelf, however, extremely happy in this ſituation [F]: but the firſt character in which he appeared to

[C] Prevented his being educated for the Church.] Speaking of the circumſtances which occaſioned a change in his deſtination, he ſays, 'Had my father's 'buſineſs permitted him to have carried me one 'month ſooner, as he intended, to the Univerſity, 'who knows but, by this time, that purer fountain 'might have waſhed my imperfections into a capa-'city of writing, inſtead of Plays and annual Odes, 'Sermons, and Paſtoral Letters (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 47.

[D] He marched with the other troops, &c.] 'Through every town we paſſed,' ſays he, 'the 'people came out, in ſome ſort of order, with ſuch 'rural and ruſty weapons as they had, to meet us, in 'acclamations of welcome and good wiſhes. This, 'I thought, promiſed a favourable end of our civil 'war, when the nation ſeemed ſo willing to be all of 'a ſide (7).'

(7) Apology, p. 134.

[E] The vehement deſire which he had formed of becoming an actor.] 'I ſaw no joy, he ſays, 'in any 'other life than that of an actor, ſo that (as before, 'when a candidate at Wincheſter) I was even afraid 'of ſucceeding to the preferment I ſought for. 'Twas 'on the ſtage alone I had formed a happineſs pre-'ferable to all that camps or courts could offer me! 'and there was I determined, let father and mother 'take it as they pleaſed, to fix my non ultra (9).' He had, however, ſome perſonal impediments to his "ſucceſs on the ſtage. He acknowledges, that his "want of a ſtrong and full voice ſoon cut ſhort his "hopes of making any valuable figure in Tragedy "(10)." When he firſt appeared on the Theatre, he had alſo, as he ſays, "an uninformed meagre "perſon (though then not ill made,) with a diſmal "pale complexion (11)." But it has been obſerved, that his defect in ſize "was probably ſoon amended, "as he latterly had a figure of ſufficient fulneſs and "weight for any part (12)."

any advantage was the Chaplain in the Orphan of Otway [G]. He afterwards excited more attention by performing the part of Lord Touchwood in the Double Dealer, to which character he was particularly recommended by Mr. Congreve, on the indiſpoſition of Kynaſton, by whom that part was originally performed. The play had been ordered to be acted by Queen Mary, and was undertaken by Cibber at a day's notice; and Congreve declared, that he had not only anſwered, but exceeded his expectations; and in conſequence of his recommendation, his ſalary was augmented to twenty ſhillings per week. His father alſo ſettled twenty pounds a year upon him, and being now in his twenty-ſecond year, he ventured to enter on the matrimonial ſtate. The Lady he married, whoſe name was Shore, had not the conſent of her father to this connexion [H]; though he was afterwards ſo far reconciled to it as to give her ſome fortune (b).

(b) Biographia Dramatica, ut ſupra.

Notwithſtanding the approbation which Cibber had received from Mr. Congreve, he continued for a conſiderable time to receive but little encouragement from the then theatrical managers. For on the opening of Drury-Lane Theatre in 1695, with the remainder of the old company, on the revolt of Betterton and ſeveral of the principal performers to Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, an occaſional prologue which Cibber had written, though acknowledged to be the beſt that had been offered, and readily paid for, yet was refuſed acceptance on any other terms, than his abſolutely relinquiſhing any claim to the ſpeaking it himſelf (i). But he ſoon after obtained conſiderable reputation, by performing the part of Fondlewife in the Old Bachelor. This character had been admirably played by Dogget, who had then quitted the ſtage: but his manner had been cloſely ſtudied by Cibber, which enabled him to imitate him very happily [I] at a ſhort notice.

(i) Id. ibid.

In 1696, he brought upon the ſtage his firſt play, entitled, "Love's laſt Shift, or the "Fool in Faſhion [K]." He met with much difficulty in getting it introduced to the theatre: for as his brother players were little diſpoſed to acknowledge his merits as an actor, neither were they more inclined to admit his pretenſions as an author. But Mr. Southern, the Dramatic Writer, having heard Cibber read his play, liked it ſo well, that he immediately recommended it to the patentees. In this play Cibber aſſigned to himſelf the part of Sir Novelty Faſhion, which was thought a good portrait of the foppery then prevalent. But even Mr. Southern entertained great doubts about his capacity to do juſtice to that character; and, therefore, when Cibber was prompting the prologue at a rehearſal, Southern took him by the hand, and ſaid, "Young man, I pronounce thy "play a good one. I will anſwer for its ſucceſs, if thou doſt not ſpoil it by thy own "action (k)." He ſucceeded, however, ſo well, both in his play, and his performance

[G] The Chaplain in the Orphan of Otway.] 'There is,' he ſays, 'in this character, of one ſcene 'only, a decent pleaſantry, and ſenſe enough to ſhew 'an audience, whether the actor has any himſelf. 'Here was the firſt applauſe I ever received, which 'you may be ſure made my heart leap with a higher 'joy, than may be neceſſary to deſcribe; and yet my 'tranſport was not then half ſo high, as at what 'Goodman (who had now left the Stage) ſaid of me, 'the next day, in my hearing. Goodman often 'came to a rehearſal for amuſement, and having ſat 'out the Orphan, the day before, in a converſation 'with ſome of the principal actors, he enquired what 'new young fellow that was, whom he had ſeen in 'the Chaplain. Upon which, Montfort replied, 'That's he, behind you. Goodman then turning 'about, looked earneſtly at me, and, after ſome 'pauſe, clapping me on the ſhoulder, rejoined, If 'he does not make a good actor, I'll be d—n'd! The 'ſurprize of being commended, by one who had 'been himſelf ſo eminent on the Stage, and in ſo 'poſitive a manner, was more than I could ſupport: 'in a word, it almoſt took away my breath, and '(laugh if you pleaſe) fairly drew tears from my 'eyes. And though it may be as ridiculous, as in-'credible, to tell you what a full vanity and content 'at that time poſſeſſed me, I will ſtill make it a 'queſtion, whether Alexander himſelf, or Charles 'the Twelfth of Sweden, when at the head of their 'firſt victorious armies, could feel a greater tranſport 'in their boſoms, than I did then in mine, when but 'in the rear of this troop of Comedians (14).'

(14) Ibid. p. 134, 135.

[H] Had not the conſent of her father to this connexion.] 'The young Lady's father, though he after-'wards thought proper to give her ſome fortune, 'yet in the ſuddenneſs of his reſentment put it out 'of his own power to beſtow on her all that he had 'originally intended her, by appropriating great part 'of what he had ſo deſigned her to the building of a 'little retirement on the Thames, which was called 'Shore's Folly, and which has been demoliſhed for 'many years paſt (15).'

(15) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 8.

[I] Enabled him to imitate him very happily.] 'At 'my firſt appearance,' he ſays, 'one might have 'imagined, by the various murmurs of the audience, 'that they were in doubt whether Dogget himſelf 'were not returned, or that they could not conceive 'what ſtrange face it could be, that ſo nearly re-'ſembled him; for I had laid the tint of forty years 'more than my real age upon my features; and, to 'the moſt minute placing of an hair, was dreſſed 'exactly like him. When I ſpoke, the ſurprize was 'ſtill greater, as if I had not only borrowed his 'cloaths, but his voice too. But though that was 'the leaſt difficult part of him to be imitated, they 'ſeemed to allow I had ſo much of him in every 'other requiſite, that my applauſe was, perhaps, 'more than proportionable. For, whether I had 'done ſo much where ſo little was expected, or that 'the generoſity of my hearers were more than uſu-'ally zealous, upon ſo unexpected an occaſion, or 'from what other motive ſuch favour might be poured 'upon me, I cannot ſay; but, in plain and honeſt 'truth, upon my going off from the firſt ſcene, a 'much better actor might have been proud of the 'applauſe that followed me. After one loud plaudit 'was ended, and ſunk into a general whiſper, that 'ſeemed ſtill to continue their private approbation, 'it revived to a ſecond, and again to a third, ſtill 'louder than the former. If to all this I add, that 'Dogget himſelf was in the pit at the ſame time, it 'would be too rank affectation, if I ſhould not con-'feſs, that, to ſee him there a witneſs of my recep-'tion, was to me as conſummate a triumph, as the 'heart of vanity could be indulged with (16).'

This ſucceſs did not prevent his continuing to meet with ſome diſcouragements [M] from the patentees; nor was he promoted to any conſiderable caſt of parts till the following year, when Sir John Vanbrugh did him a double honour; firſt, by borrowing the hint of his Comedy for the writing of his Relapſe, by way of ſequel to it; and ſecondly, by fixing on him for the performance of his favourite character in it, that of
(m) Biog. Dram. ut ſupra. Lord Foppington (m). He performed this part with ſo much ability, that it greatly increaſed his reputation as an Actor. In 1697, he produced another Comedy, entitled, "Woman's Wit, or the Lady in Faſhion [N]:" but this piece did not meet with much ſucceſs; and the author himſelf acknowledged its defects, and that it came out too ſoon after his firſt play, from his deſire of the profits which he expected from it, and for which his increaſing family made him the more ſolicitous. His next attempt was in Tragedy, his Xerxes being performed in 1699 [O], but with ſtill leſs ſucceſs than the piece which preceded it. The following year, his Comedy of Love makes a Man, or the Fop's Fortune [P], was performed at Drury-Lane with great applauſe; and the ſame year he brought Shakſpeare's King Richard the Third upon the Stage, with alterations; but it was much mutilated by the Maſter of the Revels [Q] who then licenſed all pieces for the Theatre (n).

In 1703, his Comedy, entitled, She would, and ſhe would not, or, the kind Impoſtor [R], was acted with applauſe at Drury-lane; and the following year he produced his moſt celebrated dramatic performance, the Careleſs Huſband [S], which was applauded even by Mr. Pope [T]. [P] Love makes a Man, or the Fop's Fortune.] The author of the Biographia Dramatica obſerves, that this play was 'acted at Drury-lane with great ſuc-'ceſs, and continues ſtill to give equal pleaſure when-'ever it makes its appearance. The plot of it is 'taken partly from Beaumont and Fletcher's Cuſtom 'of the Country, and partly from the Elder Brother of 'the ſame authors. There are numberleſs abſurdi-'ties, and even impoſſibilities in the conduct of the 'piece; yet the ſprightlineſs in the character of Clo-'dio, the manly tenderneſs and openneſs of Carlos, 'and the entertaining teſtineſs of Don Choleric, 'form ſo pleaſing a mixture of comic humour, as 'would atone for even greater faults than are to be 'found in this drama.'

[Q] Much mutilated by the Maſter of the Revels.] Mr. Cibber ſays, the maſter of the revels 'would 'ſtrike out whole ſcenes of a vicious, or immoral 'character, though it were viſibly ſhewn to be re-'formed or puniſhed: a ſevere inſtance of this kind 'falling upon myſelf, may be an excuſe for my re-'lating it. When Richard the Third (as I altered it 'from Shakſpeare) came from his hands to the ſtage, 'he expunged the whole firſt act, without ſparing a 'line of it. This extraordinary ſtroke of a Sic vola 'occaſioned my applying to him, for the ſmall in-'dulgence of a ſpeech or two, that the other four 'acts might limp on with a little leſs abſurdity. No! 'he had not leiſure to conſider what might be ſepa-'rately inoffenſive. He had an objection to the 'whole act, and the reaſon he gave for it was, that 'the diſtreſſes of King Henry the Sixth, who is 'killed by Richard in the firſt act, would put weak 'people too much in mind of King James, then liv-'ing in France; a notable proof of his zeal for the 'government! Thoſe who have read either the play, 'or the hiſtory, I dare ſay, will think he ſtrained hard 'for the parallel. In a word, we were forced, for 'ſome few years, to let the play take its fate, with 'only four acts divided into five (22).'

[T] Applauded even by Mr. Pope.] Dr. Johnſon obſerves, that Cibber was 'a man, whom it cannot be 'ſuppoſed that Pope could regard with much kind-'neſs or eſteem, though in one of the Imitations of 'Horace he has liberally enough praiſed the Careleſs 'Huſband (25).' The lines of Pope are theſe:

" and Iſadora [U];" and the following year two Comedies, called, " The Double " Gallant, or the ſick Lady's Cure [W];" and the " Lady's laſt Stake, or the Wife's " Reſentment [X]." He appears at this time to have been conſidered by Mr. Rich, the patentee, as an Actor of conſequence, by his excepting him from the number of the performers whom he permitted Mr. Swiney to engage with for his Theatre in the Haymarket; though Cibber, on thinking himſelf not well uſed by Rich, paid no regard to that exception, but joined Swiney. In the enſuing year, when his friend Colonel Brett obtained a fourth ſhare in the patent, and the performers formed a coalition, and returned to Drury-Lane, Mr. Cibber alſo conceded to the treaty, and returned with them. But, on the ſilencing of the patent in 1709, he, together with Wilks, Dogget, and Mrs. Oldfield, went over again to Mr. Swiney (o). His Comedy of " The Rival Fools," which was brought upon the Stage this year, was very unſucceſsful, and expoſed him to ſome degree of ridicule [Y]. In 1711, he became united as joint-patentee with Collier, Wilks, and Dogget, in the management of Drury-Lane Theatre (p). Collier farmed his ſhare to the others for 700 l. per annum, which anſwered very well to the three managing Actors, their ſhares being never leſs than 1000 l. annually to each of them, till the end of Queen Anne's reign, when the licence was ſuperſeded (q). Cibber appears to have conducted himſelf as manager with great judgment, and with much ſkill in theatrical buſineſs; but he found conſiderable inconveniencies from the different tempers of Wilks and Dogget, who were both extremely intractable, though their diſpoſitions in other reſpects were very oppoſite.

(q) Life of Cibber prefixed to his dramatic works, edit. 1760, p. 10.

At the acceſſion of King George I. a new licence was granted to Cibber, Wilks, and Booth, in conjunction with Sir Richard Steele, who obtained it by his intereſt with the Duke of Marlborough. In this connexion they were very happy for a conſiderable time, and Sir Richard attended to the management of the Theatre, and to the promotion of its intereſts: but his neceſſities occaſioning him very frequently to borrow money of the other managers, they at length found it expedient to decline advancing any farther ſums to him, till the account between them ſhould be ſettled. This offended Sir Richard ſo much, that he wholly abſented himſelf from their rehearſals, and gave himſelf no farther concern in the management of the Theatre. The other managers then made themſelves an allowance of 1 l. 13 s. 4 d. per diem, as a compenſation for their additional trouble in the management, in conſequence of Sir Richard's abſence (r). Matters continued in this ſtate for about three years, when Sir Richard was adviſed to conteſt, in the court of Chancery, the allowance, which the other managers had aſſigned to themſelves for his abſence. When the affair came to a hearing, in 1726, the buſineſs of theatrical management was ſo little underſtood by the court, that Mr. Cibber was allowed to plead his cauſe himſelf before Sir Joſeph Jekyll, then Maſter of the Rolls. He ſtated the caſe with ſo much perſpicuity and judgment, that though he had two Counſellors againſt him, each of whom afterwards attained to the dignity of Lord-Chancellor, he obtained a deciſion of the court againſt Sir Richard Steele, and by which the claims of Cibber and the other managers were confirmed (s).

It was ſeveral years before this determination, that Mr. Cibber brought upon the ſtage his Comedy of " The Nonjuror [Z]," which was very ſucceſsful, having a run of [U] Perolla and Iſadora.] In the account of this Tragedy in the Biographia Dramatica, it is remarked, that as Cibber's 'taſte was very far from lying in 'the tragic ſtrain of writing, it is not to be wonder-'ed at that this play, together with ſome others of 'his Tragedies, have been entirely ſet aſide from the 'Theatre, and even forgotten in the cloſet, ſince the 'period of their firſt appearance. In the dedication 'to Charles, Earl of Orrery, the author makes his 'acknowledgments for the aſſiſtance he received 'from that nobleman; by means of which, he ſays, 'the play reached the ſixth day (27).'

(27) Vol. ii. p. 277, 278.

[W] The Double Gallant, or the Sick Lady's Cure.] It has been obſerved, that 'part of this play is bor-'rowed from Mrs. Centlivre's Love at a Venture, or 'the French Comedy of Le Gallant double, and part 'from Burnaby's Viſiting-day. In a letter from 'Booth to A. Hill, we learn that this play at its 'firſt appearance was, as he expreſſes it, hounded in a 'moſt outrageous manner. Two years after, it was 'revived, met with moſt extravagant ſucceſs, and 'hath continued a ſtock-play ever ſince (28).'

(28) Biograph. Dram. vol. ii. p. 92.

The ſame year, Mr. Cibber brought upon the Stage a Comedy called The Comical Lovers, which was 'acted by ſubſcription at the Queen's Theatre in the 'Haymarket. This piece is compoſed of the comic 'epiſodes of Dryden's Maiden Queen and Marriage 'à la mode joined together: the alteration coſt the 'Author, as he ſays himſelf, (Pref. to Double Gal-'lant) ſix days trouble, and met with a very favour-'able reception (29).'

(29) Id. ibid. p. 61.

[X] The Lady's laſt Stake, or the Wife's Reſentment.] It is remarked by the Author of the Biographia Dramatica, that 'this is very far from a bad Comedy. 'The plot of it is in ſome meaſure borrowed from 'Burnaby's Reformed Wife, but the manners, the 'ſtyle, and many of the incidents, are original, and 'do honour to their Author (30).'

(30) Vol. ii. p. 183.

[Y] The Rival Fools, &c. expoſed him to ſome degree of ridicule.] 'This play is partly borrowed from 'Fletcher's Wit at ſeveral weapons. It met, how-'ever, with very bad ſucceſs. There happened to 'be a circumſtance in it, which, being in itſelf 'ſomewhat ridiculous, gave a part of the audience a 'favourable opportunity of venting their ſpleen on 'the Author; namely, a man in one of the earlier 'ſcenes on the Stage, with a long angling rod in his 'hand, going to fiſh for Miller's Thumbs: on which 'account ſome of the ſpectators took occaſion, 'whenever Mr. Cibber appeared, who himſelf played 'the character, to cry out continually Miller's 'Thumbs (31).'

[Z] The Nonjuror.] This play was firſt acted at Drury-Lane in 1717. The general plot of it is borrowed from the Tartuffe of Moliere; and of the deſign of it, and the circumſtances which attended its reception, Cibber himſelf gives the following account: 'About this time, jacobitiſm having lately exerted of eighteen nights; and it procured him a grant from King George I. of two hundred pounds, on his preſenting the play to his Majeſty (t). It was thought ſo important a ſervice to the government, that the merit of it occaſioned him to be appointed Poet-Laureat in the year 1730. But the number of his enemies, from party motives, was greatly augmented by this play; and his appointment to the poſt of Laureat was much cenſured. The ridicule which was employed againſt him was alſo increaſed by his annual odes, which had little merit but their loyalty, lyric poetry being a ſpecies of writing for which he had no talents, and which he probably would not have attempted, had not his office rendered it neceſſary. The efforts of his enemies ſometimes hindered the ſucceſs of his dramatic pieces [AA]; and the attacks againſt him, in verſe and in proſe [BB], were very numerous. But he appears to have been ſo little affected by them, that

'itſelf by a moſt unprovoked rebellion, I thought, 'that to ſet the authors and principles of that deſ-'perate folly in a fair light, by allowing the miſ-'taken conſciences of ſome their beſt excuſe, and by 'making the artful pretenders to conſcience as ridi-'culous as they were ungratefully wicked, was a 'ſubject fit for the honeſt ſatire of comedy; and what 'might, if it ſucceeded, do honour to the Stage, by 'ſhewing the valuable uſe of it. To give life there-'fore to this deſign, I borrowed the Tartuffe of Mo-'liere, and turned him into a modern Nonjuror. 'Upon the hypocriſy of the French character, I en-'grafted a ſtronger wickedneſs; that of an Engliſh 'Popiſh Prieſt, lurking under the doctrine of our 'own Church, to raiſe his fortune upon the ruin of 'a worthy gentleman, whom his diſſembled ſanctity 'had ſeduced into the treaſonable cauſe of a Roman 'Catholic outlaw. How this deſign in the play was 'executed, I leave to the readers of it: it cannot be 'mended by any critical remarks I can make in its 'favour: let it ſpeak for itſelf. All the reaſon I had 'to think it no bad performance was, that it was 'acted eighteen days running; and that the party 'that were hurt by it, as I have been told, have not 'been the ſmalleſt number of my back friends ever 'ſince. But happy was it for this play, that the 'very ſubject was its protection. A few ſmiles of 'ſilent contempt were the utmoſt diſgrace, that on 'the firſt day of its appearance it was thought ſafe 'to throw upon it: as the ſatire was chiefly employ-'ed on the enemies of the government, they were 'not ſo hardy as to own themſelves ſuch, by any 'higher diſapprobation or reſentment. But as it was 'then probable I might write again, they knew it 'would not be long before they might with more ſe-'curity give a looſe to their ſpleen, and make up 'accounts with me. And to do them juſtice, in 'every play I afterwards produced, they paid me 'the balance to a tittle. But to none was I more be-'holden, than that celebrated author Mr. Miſt, 'whoſe Weekly Journal, for about fifteen years fol-'lowing, ſcarcely ever failed of paſſing ſome of his 'party compliments upon me. The State and the 'Stage were his frequent parallels, and the miniſters, 'and Mynheer Keiber the manager, were as conſtantly 'drolled upon. Now, for my own part, though I 'could never perſuade my wit to have an open ac-'count with him (for as he had no effects of his own, 'I did not think myſelf obliged to anſwer his bills;) 'notwithſtanding, I will be ſo charitable to his real 'Manes, and to the aſhes of his paper, as to mention 'one particular civility he paid to my memory, after 'he thought he had ingeniouſly killed me. Soon 'after the Nonjuror had received the favour of the 'town, I read, in one of his journals, the following 'ſhort paragraph, viz. Yeſterday died Mr. Colley 'Cibber, late Comedian of the Theatre-Royal, notorious 'for writing the Nonjuror. The compliment, in the 'latter part, I confeſs I did not diſlike, becauſe it 'came from ſo impartial a judge; and it really ſo 'happened, that the former part of it was near being 'true: for I had that very day juſt crawled out, after 'having been ſome weeks laid up by a fever. How-'ever, I ſaw no uſe, in being thought to be thoroughly 'dead, before my time, and therefore had a mind to 'ſee, whether the town cared to have me alive 'again: ſo the play of the Orphan being to be acted 'that day, I quietly ſtole myſelf into the part of the 'Chaplain, which I had not been ſeen in for many 'years before. The ſurprize of the audience at my 'unexpected appearance, on the very day I had been 'dead in the news, and the paleneſs of my looks, 'ſeemed to make it a doubt whether I was not the 'ghoſt of my real ſelf departed. But when I ſpoke, 'their wonder eaſed itſelf by an applauſe, which con-'vinced me, they were then ſatisfied my friend Miſt 'had told a fib of me. Now, if ſimply to have ſhewn 'myſelf in broad life, and about my buſineſs, after 'he had notoriouſly reported me to be dead, can be 'called a reply, it was the only one which his paper, 'while alive, ever drew from me (32).'

(32) Apology, vol. ii. p. 54, 55, 56.

[AA] The efforts of his enemies ſometimes hindered the ſucceſs of his dramatic pieces.] In the preface to his Tragedy of Ximena, or the Heroic Daughter, he remarks, that he delayed the publication of that piece till ſeven years after its firſt appearance on the Stage, becauſe he had obſerved, that moſt of his plays had a better reception from the public, when his intereſt was no longer concerned in them. 'I therefore 'ſuppoſed,' ſays he, 'that this might have a fairer 'chance for favour, when the Author had no farther 'ſtake upon it: and I hope I may be allowed the 'honeſt vanity of this complaint, while I have (to my 'coſt) ſo many facts to ſupport it. Every auditor, 'whoſe memory will give him leave, cannot but 'know, that Richard the Third, which I altered from 'Shakſpeare, did not raiſe me five pounds on the 'third day, though for ſeveral years ſince, it has 'ſeldom or never failed of a crowded audience. The 'Fop's Fortune lagged on the fourth day, and only 'held up its head by the heels of the French tumb-'lers, who, it ſeems, had ſo much wit in their 'limbs, that they forced the town to ſee it, till it 'laughed itſelf into their good graces. The Kind 'Impoſtor did not pay the charges on the ſixth day, 'though it has ſince brought me, as a ſharer, more 'than I was then diſappointed of as an author. 'Twas at firſt a moot point whether The Careleſs 'Huſband ſhould live or die; but the houſes it has 'ſince filled have reproached the former coldneſs of 'its auditors. The Wife's Reſentment is another, 'though not an equal, inſtance of the ſame nature.'

[BB] The attacks againſt him, in verſe and in proſe, were very numerous.] They occurred frequently in the periodical publications of the times. He was often attacked in the Grub-Street Journal, and in Miſt's Journal, and many pieces againſt him appear in the Gentleman's Magazine. In the latter publication for January, 1732, are two burleſque imitations of his Ode for that year, and alſo the following lines in his favour, under the title of "the Laureat's "anſwer to the Poets."

'My brother poets all are d—n'd ſevere,
'Becauſe I've got a hundred pounds a year:
'They rail, they write, and threaten dire diſgrace,
'And each is angry he has not the place.
'But let theſe worthy gentlemen conſider,
'As a Dramatic Poet, I'm beſt bidder:
'My Careleſs Huſband I'll tranſmit to fate,
'With any Comedy produc'd of late.
'O! but, ſay they, he's a ſad wretch at rhyme.
'Why, gentlemen! is that ſo great a crime?
'If want of jingle I ſupply with ſenſe,
'I to the laurel have a juſt pretence.'

The following Epigram is one of the beſt of thoſe many ſmall ſatirical pieces which were publiſhed againſt that he joined heartily in the laugh againſt himſelf, and even contributed to increaſe the merriment of the public at his own expence [CC]. The ſame year in which he was made Poet-Laureat, he quitted the public buſineſs of the ſtage (u); and the following year diſpoſed of his ſhare in the patent (w). In 1740, he publiſhed, in 4to. "An Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian, and late Patentee of the "Theatre-Royal. With an hiſtorical View of the Stage during his own Time *." This work, which contains a very entertaining account of the principal dramatic performers of that period, was well received, and is ſtyled by Mr. Horace Walpole "Cib- (x) Anecdotes of Painting in England, vol. iv. p. 35. 8vo. edit. "ber's inimitable Treatiſe on the Stage (x)." He had, however, the misfortune to incur the diſpleaſure of Mr. Pope [DD], by whom he was repeatedly ſatirized [EE]; and that celebrated Poet, in the later editions of the Dunciad, made Cibber the hero

(33) Savage's Collection of Pieces in Verſe and Proſe, which have been publiſhed on occaſion of the Dunciad, p. 9.

[CC] Contributed to increaſe the merriment of the public at his own expence.] He informs us, that the public papers being "enlivened with ingenious epi- "grams, and ſatirical flirts," on account of his elevation to the poſt of Poet-Laureat, his friends would often put ſuch pieces into his hands, and deſire him to read them fairly in company. This, he ſays, was a challenge that he never declined, but always read the productions of his antagoniſts with as much impartial ſpirit as if he had written them himſelf. While he was thus beſet on all ſides, a poetical Knight-Errant happened to ſtep forth to his aſſiſtance, and who was hardy enough to publiſh ſome compaſſionate ſtanzas in his favour. On the appearance of theſe, his friends rallied him, and inſinuated that he had written them himſelf. Cibber told them, that as it gave them ſuch joy to believe them his own, he would do his beſt to make the whole town believe ſo too. Accordingly, in two days after, he wrote the following lines, and ſent them to the papers, addreſſed to himſelf:

I.
'Ah, hah! Sir Coll! is that thy way,
'Thy own dull praiſe to write?
'And would'ſt thou ſtand ſo ſure a lay?
'No, that's too ſtale a bite.

II.
'Nature, and art, in thee combine,
'Thy talents here excel:
'All ſhining braſs thou doſt outſhine,
'To play the cheat ſo well.

III.
'Who ſees thee in Iago's part,
'But thinks thee ſuch a rogue?
'And is not glad, with all his heart,
'To hang ſo ſad a dog?

IV.
'When Bays thou play'ſt, thyſelf thou art,
'For that by nature fit;
'No blockhead better ſuits the part,
'Than ſuch a coxcomb wit.

V.
'In Wronghead too, thy brains we ſee,
'Who might do well at plough;
'As fit for parliament was he,
'As for the laurel, thou.

VI.
'Bring thy protected verſe from court,
'And try it on the ſtage;
'There it will make much better ſport,
'And ſet the town in rage.

VII.
'There beaux, and wits, and cits, and ſmarts,
'Where hiſſing's not uncivil,
'Will ſhew their parts to thy deſerts,
'And ſend it to the Devil.

VIII.
'But, ah! in vain, 'gainſt thee we write,
'In vain thy verſe we maul,
'Our ſharpeſt ſatire's thy delight,
'For —— Blood! ſhoul't ſtand it all (34).'

(34) A line in the Epilogue to the Nonjuror.

IX.
'Thunder, 'tis ſaid, the laurel ſpares;
'Nought but thy brows could blaſt it:
'And yet, —— O curſt, provoking ſtars,
'Thy comfort is, thou haſt it (35).'

(35) Apol. vol. i. p. 37.

The verſes in favour of Cibber, which gave riſe to the above, may be found in the Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. I. p. 21. In the ſame volume are his New Year's Ode for the year 1731, and two Odes in ridicule of it. In one of theſe, which is entitled, An Ode on Twelfth-Day, are the following lines:

'Once more the bell-man bids us wake,
'With prophecy of ale and cake;
'Tells us before we ſleep again,
'Tom ſhall be king, and Nanny queen,
'While good ſir knight a knave appears,
'And Madam the ſlut's enſign wears.
'Such kings and queens ſhould Colley ſing,
'Such worthies in his numbers ring.'

The ſame volume likewiſe contains Cibber's Birth-Day Ode for that year, of which the following is the concluding ſtanza:

'With ſongs, ye Britons, lead the day!
'Sing, ſing the morn, that gave him breath,
'Whoſe virtues never ſhall decay,
'No, never, never taſte of death (36).'

(36) P. 494.

[DD] The misfortune to incur the diſpleaſure of Mr. Pope.] Dr. Johnſon obſerves, that 'the inceſſant 'and unappeaſable malignity of Pope, Cibber attri- 'butes to a very diſtant cauſe. After the Three 'Hours after Marriage had been driven off the ſtage, 'by the offence which the mummy and crocodile 'gave the audience, while the exploded ſcene was 'yet freſh in memory, it happened that Cibber played 'Bays in the Rehearſal; and, as it had been uſual to 'enliven the part by the mention of any recent the- 'atrical tranſactions, he ſaid, that he once thought to 'have introduced his lovers diſguiſed in a mummy 'and a crocodile. "This," ſay he, "was received "with loud claps, which indicated contempt of the "play." Pope, who was behind the ſcenes, meeting 'him as he left the ſtage, attacked him, as he ſays, 'with all the virulence of a Wit out of his ſenſes; to 'which he replied, "that he would take no other "notice of ſo particular a man, than to declare, "that, as often as he played that part, he would re- "peat the ſame provocation." He ſhews his opinion 'to be, that Pope was one of the authors of the 'play which he ſo zealouſly defended; and adds an 'idle ſtory of Pope's behaviour at a tavern (37).'

(37) Biog. Pref. to Pope's works, p. 201, 202.

[EE] By whom he was repeatedly ſatirized.] In his Epiſtle to Dr. Arbuthnot, Mr. Pope ſays,

'Whom have I hurt? has Poet yet, or Peer,
'Loſt the arch'd eye-brow, or Parnaſſian ſneer?
'And has not Colley ſtill his lord and whore?
'His butchers Henley, his free-maſons More?'

In his Imitation of the firſt Epiſtle of the ſecond Book of Horace are alſo the following lines:

"The

hero of his poem [FF]. Cibber defended himſelf by his "Letter to Mr. Pope [GG], in-"quiring into the Motives that might induce him in his ſatirical Works to be ſo frequently "fond of Mr. Cibber's name." This was publiſhed in 1742; and in 1744, he publiſhed another letter to Mr. Pope, "with an expoſtulatory Addreſs to the Rev. Mr. "William Warburton, Author of the new Preface, and adviſer in the curious Im-"provements of the Dunciad." Pope ſeems to have had but little reaſon for his animoſity againſt Cibber, and it is certain that he gained nothing by the conteſt: for Cibber ſometimes turned the laugh of the town againſt him, and gave Pope more uneaſineſs than he was willing to acknowledge [HH]. His making him the hero of the Dunciad, has been cenſured by Mr. Walpole as a "peeviſh weakneſs (y);" and it is manifeſt, that whatever might be the defects of Cibber, he could with little reaſon be reproached with dulneſs.

Though Mr. Cibber had now retired from the public and regular buſineſs of the ſtage, he did occaſionally return to it at a few particular periods; performing, it is ſaid, at no leſs a ſalary than fifty guineas per night (z). Mr. Davies informs us, that at the age of ſeventy, Cibber profeſſed himſelf the humble admirer of Mrs. Woffington. He thought himſelf happy to be her ciciſbeo and inſtructor; and his great delight was to play Nykin, or Fondlewife in the Old Bachelor, to her Cocky, or Letitia, in the ſame play (a). In 1745, when he was upwards of ſeventy-four, he appeared in the character of Pandulph, the Pope's legate, in his own Tragedy, called "Papal Tyranny "in the Reign of King John [II];" and notwithſtanding his advanced age, performed the part with great ſpirit and vigour (b). In 1747, he publiſhed, in 4to. "The Cha-"racter and Conduct of Cicero conſidered, from the Hiſtory of his Life by the Rev. "Dr. Middleton: With occaſional Eſſays, and Obſervations upon the moſt memorable "Facts and Perſons during that Period [KK]." He alſo mentions him contemptuouſly in ſome other of his pieces, and in the Dunciad the name of Cibber is frequently introduced.

[FF] Made Cibber the hero of his poem.] Dr. Johnſon obſerves, that Pope 'publiſhed a new edition 'of the Dunciad, in which he degraded Theobald 'from his painful pre-eminence, and enthroned 'Cibber in his ſtead. Unhappily the two heroes 'were of oppoſite characters, and Pope was unwilling 'to loſe what he had already written; he has there-'fore depraved his poem by giving to Cibber the old 'books, the cold pedantry, and ſluggiſh pertinacity 'of Theobald (38).'

(38) Biog. Pref. to the works of Pope, p. 205.

[GG] His Letter to Mr. Pope.] In this piece, which he ſays was written by the perſuaſion of his friends, are the following paſſages: 'That Cibber 'ever murmured at your fame, or endeavoured to 'blaſt it, or that he was not always, to the beſt of his 'judgment, as warm an admirer of your writings, as 'any of your neareſt friends could be, is what you 'cannot, by any one fact or inſtance, diſprove. How 'comes it then, that in your works you have ſo often 'treated him as a dunce or an enemy? Did he at all 'intrench upon your ſovereignty in verſe, becauſe 'he had now and then written a Comedy that ſuc-'ceeded? Or could not you bear, that any kind of 'poetry, but that, to which you chiefly pretended, 'ſhould meet with applauſe? Or was it, that he had 'an equal reputation for acting his own characters as 'for writing them; or that with ſuch inferior talents 'he was admitted to as good company as you, with 'your ſuperior, could get into; or what other offen-'ſive merit had he, that has ſo often made him the 'object of your contempt or envy?

'As to the reputation of my attempts in poetry, 'that has taken its ply long ago, and can now no 'more be leſſened by your coldeſt contempt, than it 'can be raiſed by your warmeſt commendation, were 'you inclined to give it any. Every man's work 'muſt, and will always ſpeak for or againſt itſelf, 'whilſt it has a remaining reader in the world. All 'I ſhall ſay then as to that point, is, that I wrote 'more to be fed, than to be famous; and ſince my 'writings ſtill give me a dinner, do you rhyme me 'out of my ſtomach if you can. And I own myſelf 'ſo contented a dunce, that I would not have even 'your merited fame in poetry, if it were to be at-'tended with half the fretful ſolicitude you ſeem to 'have lain under to maintain it; of which the labo-'rious rout you make about it, in thoſe loads of 'proſe rubbiſh, wherewith you have almoſt ſmothered 'your Dunciad, is ſo ſore a proof (39).'

(39) Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope, p. 5. 10. 3d edit.

[HH] Gave Pope more uneaſineſs than he was willing to acknowledge.] Dr. Johnſon ſays, 'I have 'heard Mr. Richardſon relate, that he attended his 'father on a viſit, when one of Cibber's pamphlets 'came into the hands of Pope, who ſaid, Theſe things 'are my diverſion. They ſat by him while he peruſed 'it, and ſaw his features writhen with anguiſh; and 'young Richardſon ſaid to his father, when they 'returned, that he hoped to be preſerved from ſuch 'diverſion as had been that day the lot of Pope (40).'

(40) Biog. Pref. to the works of Pope, p. 207.

It is probable that the pamphlet here ſpoken of was Cibber's firſt letter to Pope, which is a much more keen performance than the ſecond.

[II] Papal Tyranny in the reign of King John.] This Tragedy was well received. When he publiſhed it, he prefixed a dedication to the Earl of Cheſterfield, in which is the following paſſage: 'Your 'many great qualities are too well known to the 'world to want a poetical herald to proclaim them. 'It is to the private man of quality then I only make 'this addreſs: and 'tis an uncommon pleaſure to one 'of my advanced age to have been thrown into a 'habitude, that ſo frequently has permitted me to 'have an occaſional ſhare in the delight of your un-'bending hours. But ſince your lately acquired 'honours, which are honoured by your wearing them, 'have lifted you ſo far above the reach of my former 'approaches, all I can at this diſtance aſpire to, is to 'throw my cordial wiſhes after you. May your ele-'vated ſtation never lead you beyond the bounds of 'rational happineſs! That when you think fit to re-'ſign it, you may return to the private world, as 'you left it, the moſt agreeable gentleman that ever 'brought gladneſs into ſenſible ſociety.'

[KK] The character and conduct of Cicero conſidered, &c.] This is a piece of little value; and, indeed, Cibber was much better qualified to eſtimate the merits of his brother Comedians, than to inveſtigate the character or conduct of Cicero. He ſhews himſelf, in the courſe of his performance, in which are ſome very abſurd obſervations, not a little prejudiced againſt the great Roman Orator, and much inclined to juſtify or extenuate the crimes and the uſurpation of Cæſar.

[MM] His ſon Theophilus.] Theophilus Cibber was born on the 26th of November, 1703. He was ſent to Wincheſter-ſchool about the year 1716, or 1717. After continuing there ſeveral years, he returned to London, and became a performer on the ſtage. He acted in the Conſcious Lovers in 1721. As his father was one of the managers of the Theatre-Royal, he entered on the profeſſion of a Player with great advantage, and ſoon attained a conſiderable ſhare of the public favour. His manner of acting was in the ſame walk of characters which his father had ſupported with ſo much reputation; and though he did not attain to equal excellence, he was conſidered as a very reſpectable performer. His perſon, however, was far from pleaſing, and the features of his face rather diſguſting; his voice had alſo the ſame ſhrill treble, though without that muſical harmony of which his father was maſter: but he poſſeſſed a quickneſs of parts, and a perfect knowledge of what he ought to repreſent, together with a vivacity in his manner, and a kind of effronterie, which was well adapted to the characters he repreſented; and theſe qualifications were thought to counterbalance his deficiencies. From an anecdote in the Life of Garrick, it appears, that Colley Cibber was very partial to his ſon Theophilus. After he had ſeen Garrick's Bays, which the public eſteemed a maſter-piece of comic humour, he ſaid, that "Garrick was well "enough, but not ſuperior to his ſon Theophilus;" who, Mr. Davies ſays, 'had little more to recom-'mend him in the part than pertneſs and viva-'city (*)'

(*) Life of Garrick, vol. i. p. 45.

At an early period of life he married Miſs Jenny Johnſon, who was a companion and intimate friend of Miſs Raftor, afterwards the celebrated Mrs. Clive. But this lady dying in 1733, he afterwards married Miſs Suſanna Maria Arne, ſiſter to Dr. Thomas Auguſtine Arne, the eminent muſical compoſer. She was then chiefly remarkable for her muſical qualifications, but afterwards became an actreſs of uncommon merit. Her marriage with Theophilus Cibber was, however, far from promoting her happineſs. He was extravagant in the higheſt degree; and could not reſtrain his expences within the limits of his own, and his wife's ſalaries and benefits, though their amount was very conſiderable. In 1738, he took a journey to France; and ſome time after his return from that kingdom, he commenced an action againſt a young gentleman of fortune, for criminal converſation with his wife. He laid his action at five thouſand pounds, but the jury gave only ten pounds damages; it being their opinion, that he had been guilty of the meanneſs of conniving at the amour with his wife, and indeed promoting it, from a view of deriving from it pecuniary advantages. He was afterwards arreſted for conſiderable ſums, and thrown into the King's-Bench priſon. By the means of benefit-plays, and other aſſiſtances, he obtained his liberty; but as his natural paſſion for diſſipation could not be kept within bounds, he was conſtantly involved in difficulties, from which he endeavoured to extricate himſelf by various ſchemes, none of which were effectual. In 1758, he was engaged by Mr. Sheridan to go over to Dublin, (where he had been about nine years before) (†), to aſſiſt him in making a ſtand againſt the new Theatre, then opened in oppoſition to him in Crow-ſtreet. On this expedition he embarked at Park-Gate, together with Mr. Maddox, a celebrated wire-dancer, on board a veſſel called the Dublin Trader, ſome time in the month of October. But the high winds, which are frequent at that time of the year in St. George's Channel, and which are fatal to many veſſels in the paſſage from this kingdom to Ireland, proved particularly ſo to this in which Cibber was embarked. It was driven to the coaſt of Scotland, where it was caſt away, and all the paſſengers periſhed. The veſſel itſelf was ſo entirely loſt, that ſcarcely any veſtiges of it remained to indicate where it had been wrecked, excepting a box, containing books and papers, which were known to have been Cibber's, and which were caſt up on the weſtern coaſt of Scotland (42). He was the author of a Comedy called The Lover, of a groteſque pantomime entertainment called the Harlot's Progreſs, of two or three alterations of the dramatic pieces of others, and of a Diſſertation on the Theatre. The Lives of the Poets, in five volumes, 12mo. has alſo his name prefixed to the title; but that work was chiefly written by Robert Shiells (43), though Cibber is ſaid to have had a more conſiderable ſhare in it than is admitted by Dr. Johnſon (44).

The great excellence of his wife as an actreſs, renders it neceſſary that we ſhould here add ſome farther particulars concerning her. Mr. Davies ſays, 'ſhe 'was daughter to Mr. Arne, an Upholſterer, who 'lived in King-ſtreet, Covent-Garden, and was born 'much about the time that the Indian Kings, men-'tioned by the Spectator, were lodged in her father's 'houſe. When very young, her voice was ſo me-'lodious, that her friends entertained great hopes 'of her becoming a very excellent ſinger; and I be-'lieve ſhe acted, when ſhe was about fourteen years 'of age, the part of Tom Thumb in the opera of 'that name, which was ſet to muſic by her brother 'the celebrated Dr. Arne, and performed at the 'Little Theatre in the Haymarket. She certainly 'made ſome conſiderable progreſs in muſic, and was 'occaſionally employed to ſing at concerts. When 'ſhe was married to Theophilus Cibber, his father 'Colley Cibber, obſerved to his ſon, that though his 'wife's voice was very pleaſing, and ſhe had a good 'taſte in muſic, yet, as ſhe could never arrive at more 'than the rank of a ſecond-rate ſinger, her income 'would be extremely limited. The old man added, 'that he had overheard her repeat a ſpeech from a 'Tragedy, and he judged by her manner that her 'ear was good. Upon this ſhe became a pupil to 'her father-in-law, and he publickly declared, that 'he took infinite pleaſure in the inſtruction of ſo 'promiſing a genius. She was likewiſe certainly 'indebted to the leſſons of Aaron Hill for great part 'of her ſucceſs in Zara. He gave her critical leſ-'ſons upon every line of the character (45).'

She ſoon became a very diſtinguiſhed performer on the Stage; and when Tancred and Sigiſmunda was acted at Drury-Lane, in 1744, the two principal characters were performed by Mr Garrick and Mrs. Cibber, who, Mr. Davies ſays, 'were formed by na-'ture for the illuſtration of each other's talents. In 'their perſons, they were both ſomewhat below the 'middle ſize. He was, though ſhort, well made: 'ſhe, though in her form not graceful, and ſcarcely 'genteel, was, by the elegance of her manner, and 'ſymmetry of her features, rendered very attractive. 'From ſimilarity of complexion, ſize, and counte-'nance, they could have been eaſily ſuppoſed to be 'brother and ſiſter: but in the powerful expreſſion 'of the paſſions, they ſtill approached to a nearer 'reſemblance. He was maſter of all the paſſions, 'but more particularly happy in the exhibition of 'parts where anger, reſentment, diſdain, horror, 'deſpair, and madneſs predominated. In love, 'grief, and tenderneſs, ſhe greatly excelled all com-'petitors; and was alſo unrivalled in the more ardent 'emotions of jealous love, and frantic rage, which 'ſhe expreſſed with a degree of ſenſibility in voice, 'look, and action, that never failed to draw tears 'from the moſt unfeeling (46).'

(46) Ibid. vol. i. p. 80.

'Her great excellence conſiſted in that ſimplicity 'which needed no ornament; in that ſenſibility 'which deſpiſed all art. There was in her perſon 'little or no elegance, in her countenance a ſmall 'ſhare of beauty; but nature had given her ſuch 'ſymmetry of form, and fine expreſſion of feature, 'that ſhe preſerved all the appearance of youth long 'after daughter, Mrs. Charlotte Charke [NN], ſome account will be found in the notes. Se-

'after ſhe had reached to middle life. The harmony 'of her voice was as powerful as the animation of 'her look. In grief and tenderneſs her eyes looked 'as if they ſwam in tears; in rage and deſpair they 'ſeemed to dart flaſhes of fire. In ſpite of the un-'importance of her figure, ſhe maintained a dignity 'in her action, and a grace in her ſtep.

'In converſation Mrs. Cibber was extremely 'agreeable. She was civil without conſtraint, and 'polite without affectation. She was not the mere 'actreſs: her accompliſhments rendered her dear 'to perſons of the firſt quality of her ſex. There 'was ever ſuch an engaging decency in her manner, 'that notwithſtanding a peculiarity of ſituation, ſhe 'charmed and obliged all who approached her. She 'was a perfect judge of muſic, vocal and inſtrumen-'tal; and though ſhe was not miſtreſs of a voice re-'quiſite to a capital ſinger, yet her fine taſte was 'ſure to gain her the applauſe and admiration of the 'beſt judges. Though I do not vouch for the fol-'lowing ſtory, yet it will ſerve to prove the public 'opinion of her muſical expreſſion. It has been 'ſaid, that many years ſince, when ſhe ſung in the 'Oratorio of the Meſſiah at Dublin, a certain Biſhop 'was ſo affected with the extreme ſenſibility of her 'manner, that he could not refrain from ſaying, 'Woman! thy ſins be forgiven thee (47)! She made ſome attempts in Comedy, and was remarkably fond of performing the part of Lady Brute in the Provoked Wife; but her comic powers, though conſiderable, were much inferior to thoſe which ſhe diſplayed in Tragedy. She died in the 30th of January, 1766, aged fifty, and was buried in the Cloiſters in Weſt-minſter-Abbey (48).

(47) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 109, 110, 111.

(48) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 85.

When the news of her death was brought to Mr. Garrick, he pronounced her eulogium in the follow-ing words: "Then tragedy expired with her; and "yet ſhe was the greateſt female plague belonging "to my houſe. I could eaſily parry the artleſs "thruſts, and deſpiſe the coarſe language, of ſome "of my other heroines; but whatever was Cibber's "object, a new part, or a new dreſs, ſhe was always "ſure to carry her point by the acuteneſs of her in-"vective, and the ſteadineſs of her perſeverance (49)."

(49) Id. ibid.

Mr. Victor ſays, 'Every age, or half century, 'has their favourite celebrated actor, or actreſs. 'Mrs. Cibber very juſtly enjoyed that happineſs for 'more than twenty years. The firſt part this Actreſs 'appeared in was Zara, then tranſlated from Voltaire, 'by Aaron Hill, Eſq; in the year 1734; and at her 'firſt appearance ſhe became a favourite with the 'public. As I had been very early acquainted with 'the families of the Arnes and the Cibbers, I knew 'her marriage with Mr. Theophilus Cibber was 'very much againſt her inclination; and the misfor-'tunes that attended it, interrupted her progreſs in 'the buſineſs of the Stage for many years. But, for 'the laſt twenty, ſhe remained in the quiet poſſeſſion 'of all the capital characters, and in the hearts of 'the enamoured public. Her voice was muſically 'plaintive; in parts of ſoftneſs and diſtreſs ſhe ap-'peared truly amiable; without being remarkable 'for beauty, gentility, or elegance of dreſs.

'In the School for Lovers, ſhe performed the part 'of Cælia, whoſe age is mentioned in the play to be 'ſixteen; and Mrs. Cibber was admitted to become 'the character by the niceſt obſervers, though ſhe 'was at that time approaching to fifty. This ſtrange 'ſeeming abſurdity was entirely owing to that uncom-'mon ſymmetry, and exact proportion in her form, 'that happily remained with her to her death (50).'

(50) Hiſt. of the Theatres, vol. iii. p. 79, 80, 81.

The ſame writer alſo remarks, that Mrs. Cibber ſurpaſſed all that followed her, in the part of Conſtance in King John. Her character, as a dramatic Actreſs, is finely drawn by Churchill, in his Roſciad.

"Form'd for the tragic ſcene, to grace the ſtage,
"With rival excellence of Love and Rage,
"Miſtreſs of each ſoft art, with matchleſs ſkill
"To turn and wind the paſſions as ſhe will;
"To melt the heart with ſympathetic woe,
"Awake the ſigh, and teach the tear to flow;
"To put on Frenzy's wild diſtracted glare,
"And freeze the ſoul with horror and deſpair;
"With juſt deſert enroll'd in endleſs fame,
"Conſcious of worth ſuperior, CIBBER came.
"When poor Alicia's madd'ning brains are rack'd,
"And ſtrongly imag'd griefs her mind diſtract;
"Struck with her grief, I catch the madneſs too!
"My brain turns round—the headleſs trunk I view!
"The roof cracks, ſhakes and falls!—New horrors riſe,
"And Reaſon buried in the ruin lies.
"Nobly diſdainful of each ſlaviſh art,
"She makes her firſt attack upon the heart:
"Pleas'd with the ſummons, it receives her laws,
"And all is ſilence, ſympathy, applauſe.
"But when, by fond ambition drawn aſide,
"Giddy with praiſe, and puff'd with female pride,
"She quits the tragic ſcene, and, in pretence
"To comic merit, breaks down Nature's fence;
"I ſcarcely can believe my ears or eyes,
"Or find out CIBBER through the dark diſguiſe *."

She publiſhed, in 8vo. a Comedy of one act, called "The Oracle," which was performed at Covent-Garden in 1752. It is a tranſlation from the French, but is well executed, and was frequently repreſented afterwards (51).

[NN] His daughter, Mrs. Charlotte Charke.] She was the youngeſt child of the Laureat, born when her mother was forty-five years of age, and in her infancy diſcovered a wild and ungovernable diſpoſition. In her narrative of her own life, ſhe gives an account of her propenſity to a hat and wig at four years of age, and mentions ſeveral ſtrange frolicks played by her in her youth. She had "a natural averſion" ſhe ſays, "for a needle, and a profound reſpect for a curry-"comb, in the uſe of which ſhe excelled moſt young "ladies in Great-Britain." Her father, however, ſpared no expence in her education; ſhe was taught French, Italian, and ſome Latin; and alſo inſtructed in geography, muſic, and dancing. Employments of a very different kind, however, frequently engaged her attention; and when ſhe was fourteen, ſhe was particularly fond of ſhooting; imagining herſelf, ſhe ſays, "equal to the beſt fowler or markſman in the "univerſe (52)." Among her other favourite amuſements were hunting, riding races, and digging in a garden. She married, when very young, Mr. Richard Charke, an eminent performer on the violin; but her huſband had a great attachment to other women, and they ſoon ſeparated. She then went upon the Stage, and firſt appeared in the character of Mademoiſelle in the Provoked Wife, in which ſhe was well received. From this ſhe roſe, in her ſecond and third attempts, to the capital characters of Alicia in Jane Shore, and Andromache in the Diſtreſſed Mother. She was hereupon engaged, at a very good ſalary, at the Theatre at the Hay-market, and afterwards at Drury-Lane. But her imprudence, and impetuoſity of temper, occaſioned her to quarrel with Mr. Fleet-wood, the then manager, whom ſhe not only left on a ſudden, without any notice given, but vented her ſpleen againſt him in public, by publiſhing, in 1735, a farce called "The Art of Management (53);" in which ſhe endeavoured to place him in a very ridicu-lous light. However, at the deſire of her father, he afterwards received her again; but her repeated miſ-conduct ſoon cauſed her to be thrown out of employ-ment in her profeſſion as an actreſs. She then com-menced trader, and ſet up as a grocer and oil-woman in a ſhop in Long-Acre. But this ſituation ſhe ſoon quitted, and afterwards became miſtreſs of a puppet-ſhow, by which undertaking ſhe was a loſer. After that ſhe went for many years in man's cloaths. For ſome time ſhe was Valet de Chambre to a Peer, afterwards ſet up an eating-houſe in Drury-Lane, and at length became a drawer at Marybone. She was alſo a dealer in pork; and nine years of her life was a ſtrolling-player in the country. In Wales, ſhe turned paſtry-cook and farmer; and at Briſtol, hired herſelf to a printer, as corrector of the preſs. On her return to London ſhe publiſhed, in numbers, in 1755, a Narrative of her own life, to which ſhe pre-fixed a dedication from herſelf to herſelf. She com-plains much that her father would not take the leaſt notice of her; but he was very indulgent to her in the former part of her life, and ſeems not to have de-ſerted her till ſhe was grown profligate and diſſolute to a very high degree. She kept a public houſe at Iſling-ton for ſome time, and died on the 6th of April, 1760, having not long ſurvived her father and brother (54).

veral of his dramatic pieces, not before mentioned [OO], are alſo enumerated below. He appears to have been a man of uncommon vivacity, great good humour [PP], much benevolence, and a large ſhare of vanity; and it was the preponderance of the latter quality, and the liberties which he ſometimes took with others, though without any ill intentions, that occaſioned him to have no ſmall number of enemies, by whom he was often attacked with more ſeverity than he deſerved. Their attacks, however, ſeem to have made very little impreſſion upon him; and he would acknowledge his own foibles with the utmoſt frankneſs [QQ]. As an actor he had great merit, and appeared in very various characters [RR]; but his chief excellency lay in the walk of fops, and feeble old men in comedy; in the former of which he is ſuppoſed never to have been excelled. He appears to have poſſeſſed much judgment as a theatrical manager [SS]: his Myrtillo, a paſtoral interlude, performed at Drury-Lane in 1716.

Cæſar in Egypt, a Tragedy, acted at Drury-Lane in 1725.

The Provoked Huſband, or a Journey to London. It is obſerved in the Biographia Dramatica, that 'this Comedy was begun by Sir John Vanbrugh, 'but left by him imperfect at his death, when Mr. 'Cibber took it in hand, and finiſhed it. It met 'with very great ſucceſs; yet ſuch is the power of 'prejudice, and perſonal pique, in biaſſing the 'judgment, that Mr. Cibber's enemies, ignorant of 'what ſhare he had in the writing of the piece, be-'ſtowed the higheſt applauſe on the part which re-'lated to Lord Townly's provocations from his wife, 'which was moſtly Cibber's, at the ſame time that 'they condemned and oppoſed the journey to London 'part, which was almoſtly entirely Vanbrugh's, for 'no other apparent reaſon, but becauſe they ima-'gined it to be Mr. Cibber's. He ſoon, however, 'convinced them of their miſtake, by publiſhing all 'the ſcenes which Sir John had left behind him, ex-'actly from his own MS. under the ſingle title of 'the Journey to London.'

The Rival Queans, with the Humours of Alexander the Great. This is ſtyled "a Comical Tragedy," and was acted at Drury-Lane. It was not publiſhed in London, but was printed at Dublin in 1729. It is a burleſque of Lee's Rival Queens, or Death of Alexander the Great.

Love in a Riddle, a Paſtoral, 8vo. 1729. The Farce of Damon and Phillida is taken entirely from this piece, and was well received; but the original piece met with an unfavourable reception, from the mere prejudice of many of the audience againſt the Author (56).

(56) Biog. Dram.

[PP] Great good humour.] The writer of his article in the Biographia Dramatica ſays, 'He ſeemed 'moſt truly of Sir Harry Wildair's temper, whoſe 'ſpleen nothing could move but impoſſibilities. 'Nor did it ſeem in the power of even age and in-'firmity to get the better of this ſelf-created hap-'pineſs in his diſpoſition: for even in the very latter 'years of his life, I remember to have ſeen him, 'when, amidſt the circle of perſons, not one of whom 'perhaps had attained to the third part of his age, 'yet has Mr. Cibber, by his eaſy good humour, 'livelineſs of converſation, and a peculiar happineſs 'he had in telling a ſtory, been apparently the very 'life of the company; and, but for the too evident 'marks of the hand of time on his features, might 'have been imagined the youngeſt man in it (57).'

(57) Vol. i. p. 80, 81.

Mr. Davies ſays, that 'Colley Cibber, to the re-'putation of an approved and ſucceſsful actor, ad-'ded the higher character of a diſtinguiſhed dramatic 'writer. His merit in both capacities introduced 'him to perſons in high life, and made him free of 'all gay companies. In his youth, he was a man of 'great levity, and the conſtant companion of our 'young noblemen and men of faſhion in their hours 'of diſſipation. Cibber diverted them with his ſal-'lies of humour, and odd vivacities. He had the 'good fortune, in advanced life, to ſolace the cares 'of a great Stateſman, in his relaxations from buſi-'neſs. Mr. Pelham loved a tete à tete with Colley 'Cibber; and, I think, the latter tells us ſo, in the 'dedication of his excellent apology to that wiſe and 'honeſt Miniſter. But an habitual love of play, and 'a rivetted attachment to pleaſure, rendered him not 'ſo agreeable to perſons of a grave turn of mind (58).'

(58) Life of Garrick, vol. ii. p. 359.

[QQ] He would acknowledge his own foibles with the utmoſt frankneſs.] He ſays in his Apology, 'I will 'not go out of my character, by ſtraining to be wiſer 'than I can be, or by being more affectedly penſive 'than I need be. Whatever I am men of ſenſe will 'know me to be, put on what diſguiſe I will. I can 'no more put off my follies than my ſkin. I have 'often tried; but they ſtick too cloſe to me. Nor 'am I ſure that my friends are diſpleaſed with them; 'for, beſides that in this light I afford them frequent 'matter of mirth, they may poſſibly be leſs uneaſy 'at their own foibles, when they have ſo old a pre-'cedent to keep them in countenance.'—'If I can 'pleaſe myſelf with my own follies, have not I a 'plentiful proviſion for life? If the world thinks me 'a trifler, I don't deſire to break in upon their wiſ-'dom. Let them call me any fool, but an unchear-'ful one; I live as I write; while my way amuſes 'me, its as well as I wiſh it; when another writes 'better, I can like him too, though he ſhould not 'like me. Not our great imitator of Horace himſelf 'can have more pleaſure in reading his verſes, than 'I have in reading them, though I ſometimes find 'myſelf there (as Shakſpeare terms it) diſpraiſingly 'ſpoken of. If he is a little free with me, I am ge-'nerally in good company; he is as blunt with my 'betters; ſo that even here I might laugh in my 'turn. My ſuperiors, perhaps, may be mended by 'him; but, for my part, I own myſelf incorrigible. 'I look upon my follies as the beſt part of my for-'tune; and am more concerned to be a good huſband 'of them, than of that; nor do I believe I ſhall ever 'be rhimed out of them.'—'We had once a merry 'monarch of our own, who thought chearfulneſs ſo 'valuable a bleſſing, that he would have quitted one 'of his kingdoms where he could not enjoy it; 'where, among many other conditions they had tied 'him to, his ſober ſubjects would not ſuffer him to 'laugh on a Sunday; and though this might not be 'the avowed cauſe of his elopement, I am not ſure, 'had he had no other, that this alone might not have 'ſerved his turn. At leaſt, he has my hearty appro-'bation either way: for had I been under the ſame 'reſtriction, though my ſtaying were to have made 'me his ſucceſſor, I ſhould rather have choſen to fol-'low him (59).'

(59) Vol. i. p. 15, 16, 17, 18.

[RR] Appeared in very various characters.] Mr. Davies ſays, that 'Cibber, in the various extent of 'his comic exhibitions, had no equal; beſides, he 'was much celebrated for ſome parts in Tragedy; for 'Richard the Third, Iago, and Cardinal Wolſey (60).'

(60) Life of Garrick, vol. i. p. 19.

[SS] He appears to have poſſeſſed much judgment as a theatrical manager.] It muſt, however, be obſerved, that in ſome inſtances he ſeems to have made capital miſtakes in this reſpect; and he is alſo charged with having treated ſeveral dramatic writers with rudeneſs and petulance. Mr. Davies ſays, 'Colley 'Cibber, I believe, deſerved many of thoſe keen 'reproaches and bitter ſarcaſms, which are to be 'read in ſeveral pamphlets publiſhed during his ad-'miniſtration of the Stage: for his denial of a new 'piece was not attended with that delicacy and 'politeneſs, which is ſo neceſſary upon an unwel-'come repulſe, and which muſt, however gently de-'livered, overwhelm an author who is obliged to 'hear it, with confuſion and vexation. Cibber, by 'his ſole authority, obliged Mr. Hughes to alter the 'moſt material circumſtance in his Siege of Damaſ-'cus, and thereby rendered feeble, and almoſt ineſ-'fectual, the author's ſcene between Phocyas and 'Eudocia, his own pieces are in general of a moral tendency; and his comedies have a juſt claim to conſiderable applauſe [TT]. He collected and publiſhed the beſt of his dramatic pieces in two volumes, 4to. in his life-time; and they have ſince been more completely publiſhed, in five volumes, 12mo. in 1760.] T.

'Eudocia, after his betraying the city to the Saracens: for Mr. Hughes had cauſed the hero, in 'order to ſave Damaſcus, and the lives of his miſtreſs 'and the citizens, in the agony of his ſoul, to turn 'Mahometan. But Colley, with his uſual confidence, declared, that the audience would not bear 'a hero who could change his religion. When Mr. 'Fenton read his Tragedy of Mariamne to Cibber, 'he not only rejected it, but ſpoke in the following 'inſolent manner to the learned author: "Sir, will 'you take the advice of a friend? Apply yourſelf to 'ſome honeſt and laborious calling; the Belles 'Lettres and you will never agree; you have no 'manner of genius for Poetry." This charge againſt 'Cibber was printed in a pamphlet called the Laureat, 'ſoon after he had publiſhed the Apology of his 'Life, 1740: but this play, when acted ſoon after at 'Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, raiſed the ſinking credit of 'the company, and eſtabliſhed the characters of 'Boheme and Mrs. Seymour, who acted the parts of 'Herod and Mariamne. Not to detain the reader 'any longer than I ought, about Colley Cibber's 'petulance, I ſhall only obſerve, that it is a well 'known fact, that he refuſed the Beggar's Opera, 'and he is charged with taking a particular delight 'to mortify young authors: his practice of giving 'back their plays he wantonly called the choaking of 'ſinging birds. This anecdote is to be found in the 'ſame pamphlet of the Laureat (61).'

(61) Life of Garrick, vol. i. p. 209, 210, 211.

[TT] His comedies have a juſt claim to conſiderable applauſe.] The writer of his article in the Biographia Dramatica ſays, 'I thank the Engliſh Stage as much 'obliged to Mr. Cibber, for a fund of rational entertainment, as to any dramatic writer this nation has 'produced, Shakſpeare only excepted; and one unanſwerable evidence has been borne to the ſatisfaction the public received from his plays, and ſuch 'an one as no author beſides himſelf can boaſt, viz. 'that although the number of his dramatic pieces is 'very extenſive, half of them at leaſt are now, and 'ſeem likely to continue, on the liſt of acting and 'favourite plays (62).'

(62) Vol. i. p. 85.

Mr. Victor alſo obſerves, that he enjoyed the reputation, 'for thirty years, of being the greateſt actor for 'that time in his caſt;' and that 'the Stage is beholden 'to Mr. Cibber for more good Comedies than to any 'one author; which will perpetuate his name as long 'as the Engliſh language exiſts (63).'] T.

CLAGETT (NICOLAS), an eminent Divine in the XVIIth century, was born in the city of Canterbury (a), about the year 1607 [A]. In the beginning of the year 1628, he was entered a ſtudent of Merton-College in Oxford (b); and on the 20th of October 1631, took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, as a member of that Houſe (c). Afterwards he removed to Magdalen-Hall in the ſame Univerſity (d), and took his degree of Maſter of Arts the 11th of June 1634 (e), being then generally eſteemed a very able moderator in Philoſophy (f). About the year 1636, he became Vicar of Melbourne in Dorſetſhire; and, ſome years after, was elected Preacher at St. Mary's Church in St. Edmundſbury, Suffolk, where he was held in great veneration for his improving way of preaching, and for his ſingular piety. He died on the 12th of September 1663, aged fifty-ſix years, or thereabouts, and was buried in the chancel of St. Mary's Church before-mentioned (g). [A] Was born——about the year 1607.] This appears from his age at the time of his death, mentioned above, namely, that he was fifty-ſix, in the year 1663. But there ſeems to be a miſtake in what Mr. Wood ſays of his age. For if he was fifty-ſix years of age in 1663, and conſequently born in 1607, he muſt have been twenty-one years old when he was admitted into the Univerſity; which is a little improbable, the uſual years of admiſſion there being about ſeventeen or eighteen. It is therefore more probable that he was born about the year 1610, and that he was not quite ſo old at the time of his death as Mr. Wood imagined. M.

CLAGETT (WILLIAM), a moſt valuable and learned Divine in the XVIIth century, and eldeſt ſon of Mr. Nicolas Clagett, mentioned in the laſt article, was born at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, September 14, 1646 (a). His education was in the Free-ſchool there, under the care of Dr. Thomas Stephens, author of the notes on Statius's Sylvæ, who took very early notice of the promiſing parts of his ſcholar. What great and uncommon improvements he made, is manifeſt from his early admiſſion into the univerſity, even before he was full thirteen years of age: for he was admitted in Emanuel-College in Cambridge, September 5, 1659, under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Jackſon (b). He regularly took his degrees in Arts, and commenced Doctor in Divinity in 1683 (c). His firſt public appearance in the world, was at his own native town of St. Edmundſbury, where he was choſen one of the Preachers; which office he diſcharged for ſeven years with an univerſal reputation (d). From thence, at the inſtance of ſome conſiderable men of the long robe, whoſe buſineſs at the aſſizes there gave them opportunities of being acquainted with his great worth and abilities, he was prevailed with to remove to Gray's-Inn: and it was no ſmall teſtimony given to his merit, that he was thought worthy by that honourable Society to ſucceed the eminent Dr. Cradock, as their Preacher (e). He continued in this place all the remaining part of his life, and therein behaved himſelf worthily; which the gentlemen of that Houſe took all occaſions of declaring, by the conſtant kindneſs they expreſſed to him while he lived, and the reſpects they paid him at his death (f). Beſides this honourable employment, he was preſented, by the Lord Keeper North (who was his wife's kinſman) to the rectory of Farnham-Royal in Buckinghamſhire, into which he was inſtituted May 14, 1683 (g). He

He had another preferment, which he himſelf moſt valued next to his Preacher's place at Gray's-Inn, and that was the Lecture of St. Michael Baſſiſhaw, to which he was elected by that pariſh about two years before his death [A]. He was alſo Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majeſty (b). This excellent perſon, who was worthy of a longer life, was untimely ſnatched away by the ſmall-pox, in the forty-ſecond year of his age. He was ſeized with that fatal diſtemper on a Sunday evening, March the 16th, after having preached at St. Martin in the Fields, in his Lent courſe there (i): and dying of it March 28, 1688, he was buried in a vault under part of the church of St. Michael Baſſiſhaw (k). His wife, Mrs. Thomaſin North, a moſt virtuous and accompliſhed woman, died eighteen days after him of the ſame diſeaſe, and was buried in the ſame grave with him (l). We are aſſured, by the teſtimony of Dr. Sharp (m), that no man of a private condition, in the laſt age, died more lamented. For, as he had all the amiable charming qualities to procure the eſteem and love of every one who knew him, ſo he was endowed with ſo many great and uſeful talents, for the doing ſervice to religion, to the Church, to all about him; and he ſo faithfully and induſtriouſly employed thoſe talents to theſe purpoſes, that he was really a public bleſſing, and he had that right done him as to be eſteemed ſo. It was the Society of Gray's-Inn that brought him to London: but after he came thither, his own merit, in a little time, rendered him ſufficiently conſpicuous. For, ſo innocent and unblameable was his life, ſuch an unaffected honeſty and ſimplicity appeared in all his converſation, ſo obliging he was in his temper, ſo ſincere in all his friendſhips, ſo ready to do all ſorts of good offices that came in his way; and withal ſo prudent a man, ſo good a preacher, ſo dextrous in untying knots, and making hard things plain; ſo happy in treating of common ſubjects in an uncommon, and yet uſeful way; ſo able a champion for the true religion againſt all oppoſers whatſoever; and, laſtly, ſo ready upon all occaſions to adviſe, to direct, to encourage any work that was undertaken for the promoting or defending the cauſe of God;—all theſe qualities were ſo eminent in Dr. Clagett, that it was impoſſible they ſhould be concealed. The town ſoon took notice of him, and none that intimately knew him could forbear to love and admire him; and ſcarcely any that had heard of him, to eſteem and honour him (n). Biſhop Burnet ranks him among thoſe worthy and eminent men, whoſe lives and labours did, in a great meaſure, reſcue the Church from thoſe reproaches that the follies of others drew upon it: and adds,—that they deſerved a high character; and were indeed an honour, both to the Church and to the age in which they lived (o). It muſt not be forgotten, that he was one of thoſe excellent Divines, who made that noble ſtand againſt Popery in the reign of King James II. which will redound to their immortal honour.—The ſeveral things publiſhed by Dr. Clagett, are as follows: I. [B] Part II. Lond. 1680, 8vo. &c.] The learned author compoſed alſo a third part. Dr. Owen having made a great ſhew, in the margin of his book, of quotations from the Fathers, as if Antiquity had been on his ſide; it was intended in this third part to prove (as may be ſeen in the concluſion of the ſecond part) that Dr. Owen had not the Fathers with him, as he pretended. Dr. Clagget had finiſhed his Collections from the Ancients to this purpoſe, and made the book ready for the preſs; but it happened unfortunately that the manuſcript copy was lodged with a friend of his, whoſe houſe was burnt, and the book periſhed in the flames. After this accident he attempted to make his collections over again, but never had an opportunity to finiſh them (2). The firſt, printed in 1689, contained ſeventeen ſermons; with the Sum of a Conference on February 21, 1686, between Dr. Clagett and Father Gooden, about the point of Tranſubſtantiation. One of theſe ſermons was greatly admired by Queen Mary [E]. The ſecond volume, printed in 1693, contained eleven ſermons: A Paraphraſe and Notes upon the firſt, ſecond, third, fourth, fifth, ſeventh, and eighth Chapters of the Goſpel of St. John [F]: The Paraphraſe, and Notes on the ſixth Chapter, which had been publiſhed before: A Diſcourſe of Church-Unity, with Directions how, in this divided State of Chriſtendom, to keep within the Unity of the Church: A Diſcourſe of Humanity and Charity: And a Letter concerning Proteſtants Charity to Papiſts; publiſhed by Dr. Clagett. The third and fourth volumes did not come out till the year 1720; which was at ſo great a diſtance of time from the two former volumes, that the Bookſellers concerned could not be prevailed with to call them the third and fourth volumes, as they really were; but they were called the firſt and ſecond volume, as well as the former: only notice was given, that they were never before publiſhed (s). [C] From the original French of Father Touſſain Bridoul, a Jeſuit.] By theſe ſeveral learned pieces, which Dr. Clagett publiſhed himſelf, the reader may in ſome meaſure (as Dr. Sharp obſerves) be able to make a judgment of his genius and abilities (3). If a friend, adds he, can ſpeak without partiality, there doth in thoſe writings appear ſo ſtrong a judgment, ſuch an admirable faculty of reaſoning, ſo much honeſty and candour of temper, ſo great plainneſs and perſpicuity, and withal ſo much ſpirit and quickneſs; and, in a word, all the qualities that can recommend an author, or render his books excellent in their kind; that I ſhould not ſcruple to give Dr. Clagett a place among the moſt eminent and celebrated writers of this Church. And if he may be allowed that, it is as great an honour as can be done him. For perhaps from the inſpired age to this, the world did never ſee more accurate, and more judicious compoſures in matters of Religion, than the Church of England has produced in our days.

(3) Preface, as above.

[D] His brother Mr. Nicolas Clagett publiſhed four volumes of his Sermons.] Theſe poſthumous Sermons, as Dr. Sharp well obſerves (4), do ſufficiently ſpeak their author. For they every where expreſs the ſpirit, the judgment, and the reaſoning of that excellent man; though ſome of them, perhaps, want that finiſhing which his maſterly hand would have given them, had he been to have publiſhed them himſelf. The learned publiſher informs us (5), that his ſudden thoughts upon a ſubject were ſo marvellouſly good, that they ſeemed to flow from a fountain of reaſon, and diſcovered a great readineſs of judgment in him; but they were very clear and full diſcourſes, which he took any time, and a particular care to compoſe.

It was compoſed by the learned author upon occaſion of the death of a child of his, that happened a little before; and it was the laſt he made. The laſt he preached, was the ſeventeenth in the firſt volume (7).

CLAGETT (NICOLAS), a learned Divine in the XVIIth, and part of the XVIIIth century, was a younger ſon of Mr. Nicolas Clagett, Miniſter of St. Edmundſbury, and brother to Dr. William Clagett mentioned in the laſt article. He is entered in the regiſter-book of St. Mary's pariſh in Bury, as baptized, May 20, 1654 (a). His education was in the Free-ſchool of the place of his nativity, which was at that time time under the care of Mr. Edward Leeds [A]. From hence he was ſent to Chriſt's-College in Cambridge, where he was admitted January 12, 1671, under the tuition of Dr. Widdrington. He regularly took his degrees in Arts, and in 1704 commenced Doctor in Divinity. Upon his brother's removal to Gray's-Inn, he was elected in his room, March 21, 1680, Preacher at St. Mary's in St. Edmundſbury. In this ſtation he continued near forty-ſix years: and, during that long period of time, was a conſtant preacher, and diligent in every other part of his miniſtry. On the firſt of February 1683, he was inſtituted to the Rectory of Thurlo parva. Dr. John Moore, then Biſhop of Norwich, who was well acquainted with his merit and abilities, collated him, on the 14th of June, 1693, to the Archdeaconry of Sudbury. He had alſo the Rectory of Hitcham in Suffolk, to which he was inſtituted March 8, 1707 (b). This eminent Divine lived extremely valued and reſpected, on account of his exemplarineſs, charity, and other virtues; and died much lamented, on the 27th of January, 1726-7, in the ſeventy-third year of his age. He was buried in the chancel of the pariſh church of St. Mary's, in St. Edmundſbury. Among other children, he had Nicolas, afterwards Lord Biſhop of Exeter. The following things were publiſhed by him: I. 'A Perſuaſive to 'Peaceableneſs and Obedience, being an Aſſize Sermon preached at St. Edmundſbury.' Lond. 1683, 4to. II. A pamphlet, intituled, 'A Perſuaſive to an ingenuous Trial of 'Opinions in Religion.' Lond. 1685, 4to. III. CLARKE (Dr. SAMUEL), a very learned and eminent Divine of the laſt and preſent centuries, was born in the city of Norwich [A], the 11th of October, 1675, and educated in the Free-ſchool of that place, under the care of the Reverend Mr. Burton. In 1691, he was removed to Caius-College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr. Ellis, afterwards Sir John Ellis (a). Here his great genius and abilities ſoon diſcovered themſelves; and, before he was much above twenty-one years of age, he greatly contributed, both by his own example, and his excellent tranſlation of, and notes upon, Rohault's Phyſicks [B], to the eſtabliſhment of the Newtonian Philoſophy [C]. Afterwards he turned

[A] He was born at Norwich.] His father was Edward Clarke, Eſq; Alderman of that city, and one of it's Repreſentatives in Parliament for ſeveral years; a gentleman of an excellent natural capacity, and untainted reputation for probity and virtue. His mother was Hannah, the daughter of Mr. Samuel Parmenter, Merchant, of the ſame city (1). Mr. Whiſton informs us (2), that Mr. Clarke was ſo acceptable to the citizens of Norwich, that they choſe him, without any ſolicitation, nay, againſt his own inclination, to repreſent them in Parliament.

[B] His tranſlation of, and notes upon, Rohault's Phyſicks.] There have been four editions of it: the firſt in 1697, in 8vo; the laſt in 1718, in 8vo, under this title: Jacobi Rohaulti Phyſica: Latine vertit, recenſuit, & uberioribus jam Annotationibus, ex illuſtriſſimi Iſaaci Newtoni Philoſophia maximam partem hauſtis, amplificavit & ornavit S. Clarke, S.T.P. Accedunt etiam in hac quarta editione novæ aliquot Tabulæ æri inciſæ, & Annotationes multum ſunt auctæ. Dr. John Clarke, Dean of Sarum, and our author's brother, tranſlated this work into Engliſh, and publiſhed it, in two volumes, 8vo, under the title of: Rohault's Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy; illuſtrated with Dr. Samuel Clarke's Notes, taken moſtly out of Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy; with Additions. Done into Engliſh by John Clarke, D. D. The motives that induced Dr. Samuel Clarke to tranſlate, and comment upon, Mr. Rohault, may be ſeen in the following remark.

[C] He greatly contributed——to the eſtabliſhment of the Newtonian Philoſophy] When our author came firſt to the Univerſity, the ſyſtem of Des Cartes was the eſtabliſhed Philoſophy there; though (as Biſhop Hoadly juſtly obſerves) it was no more than the invention of an ingenious and luxuriant fancy, having no foundation in the reality of things, nor any correſpondency to the certainty of facts. Mr. Ellis himſelf (Mr. Clarke's tutor) though a very learned man, was a zealot for this Philoſophy, and no doubt gave his pupils the moſt favourable impreſſions of what he had ſo cloſely embraced himſelf. The great Sir Iſaac Newton had indeed then publiſhed his Principia. But this book was but for the few; both the matter and manner of it placing it out of the reach of the generality even of learned readers; and ſtrong prejudice, in favour of what had been received, working againſt it. But neither the difficulty of the taſk, nor the reſpect Mr. Clarke paid to the director of his ſtudies, nor the warmth and prejudice of all around him, had any influence upon his mind. Diſſatisfied therefore with arbitrary Hypotheſes, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of what was real and ſubſtantial. And in this ſtudy he made ſuch uncommon advances, that he was preſently maſter of the chief parts of the Newtonian Philoſophy; and, in order to his firſt degree, performed a public exerciſe in the Schools, upon a queſtion taken from thence; which ſurprized the whole audience, both for the accuracy of knowledge, and clearneſs of expreſſion, that appeared through the whole.

turned his thoughts to Divinity [D]; and, having taken holy orders, became Chaplain to Dr. John Moore, Biſhop of Norwich [E]. In 1699, he publiſhed Three Practical Eſſays upon Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance [F], and an anonymous piece, intituled, Reflexions on Part of a Book, called Amyntor [G]. In 1701, he publiſhed his Paraphraſe

The Syſtem of Natural Philoſophy, then generally taught in the Univerſity, was that written by Mr. Rohault, entirely founded upon the Carteſian principles, and very ill tranſlated into Latin. Mr. Clarke juſtly thought, that Philoſophical notions might be expreſſed in pure Latin; and therefore reſolved to give a new tranſlation of that author, and to add to it ſuch notes, as might lead ſtudents inſenſibly, and by degrees, to other and truer notions than could be found there. And this certainly (the Biſhop obſerves) was a more prudent method of introducing truth unknown before, than to attempt to throw aſide this treatiſe entirely, and write a new one inſtead of it. The ſucceſs anſwered exceedingly well to his hopes. For, by this means, the true Philoſophy has, without any noiſe, prevailed: and to this day his tranſlation of Rohault is, generally ſpeaking, the ſtanding text for lectures; and his notes, the firſt direction to thoſe, who are willing to receive the reality and truth of things, in the place of invention and romance (3). Mr. Whiſton relates (4), that, in the year 1697, while he was Chaplain to Dr. Moore, then Biſhop of Norwich, he met young Mr. Clarke (at that time wholly unknown to him) at one of the Coffee-houſes in the Market-place of Norwich; where they entered into a converſation about the Carteſian Philoſophy, particularly Rohault's Phyſicks, which Mr. Clarke's Tutor (Mr. Whiſton ſays) had put him to tranſlate. Mr. Whiſton, being aſked his opinion concerning the fitneſs of ſuch a tranſlation, anſwered; 'that ſince 'the youth of the Univerſity muſt have, at preſent, 'ſome ſyſtem of Natural Philoſophy for their ſtudies 'and exerciſes; and ſince the true ſyſtem of Sir Iſaac 'Newton was not yet made eaſy enough for that pur-'poſe; it was not improper, for their ſakes, to tranſ-'late and uſe the Syſtem of Rohault, who was eſteem-'ed the beſt expoſitor of of Des Cartes; but that as 'ſoon as Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy came to be 'better known, that only ought to be taught, and the 'other dropped.' Which laſt part of his advice (Mr. Whiſton tells us) has not been followed; Dr. Clarke's Rohault being ſtill the principal book for young ſtudents in the Univerſity. 'Though ſuch an obſerva-'tion (he adds) is no way to the honour of the Tutors, 'who, in reading Rohault, do only read a Philoſophi-'cal Romance to their pupils, almoſt perpetually con-'tradicted by the better notes thereto belonging.' However, upon this occaſion, Mr. Whiſton and Mr. Clarke fell into a diſcourſe about the wonderful diſcoveries made in Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophy. And the reſult was, that Mr. Whiſton was greatly ſurprized, that ſo young a man, as Mr. Clarke then was, ſhould know ſo much of theſe ſublime diſcoveries, which were then almoſt a ſecret to all, but to a few particular Mathematicians.

[D] He turned his thoughts to Divinity.] His firſt ſtudies, in order to fit himſelf for the ſacred function, were, the Old Teſtament in the original Hebrew, the New in the original Greek, and the Primitive Chriſtian writers. The firſt of theſe he then read with that exactneſs of judgment, which very few have ſhewn after a much longer application; and which furniſhed him with many obſervations, written at that time with his own hand in the margin, relating to the miſtakes of the common tranſlation of it (5).

(5) Account, &c. ubi ſupra.

[E] He became Chaplain to Dr. John Moore, Biſhop of Norwich.] This Prelate, the greateſt patron of Learning, and learned men, received Mr. Clarke into his familiarity and friendſhip, to ſuch a remarkable degree, that he lived for nearly twelve years in that ſtation, with all the decent freedoms of a brother and an equal, rather than an inferior. The Biſhop's value for him increaſed every day, and there was no mark of eſteem he did not ſhew him while he lived: and, at his death, he gave him the higheſt proof of confidence in leaving all the concerns of his family ſolely in his hands; a truſt, which Mr. Clarke executed with the moſt faithful exactneſs, and to the entire ſatisfaction of every perſon concerned (6). Mr. Whiſton (7) lays claim to the merit of introducing Mr. Clarke to the acquaintance and friendſhip of the Biſhop of Norwich. After the converſation mentioned above (8), which Mr. Whiſton gave the Biſhop an account of, upon his return to the Palace, Alderman Clarke and his ſon were, by order of the Biſhop, invited, and handſomely entertained by Mr. Whiſton at the Palace. The next year (1698) Mr. Whiſton, being collated by the Biſhop to the Living of Loweſtoft in Suffolk, reſigned his Chaplainſhip, in which he was ſucceeded by Mr. Clarke.

[F] His three Practical Eſſays upon Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance.] The whole title is: Three practical Eſſays on Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance: Containing full Inſtructions for a Holy Life; with earneſt Exhortations, eſpecially to young Perſons, drawn from the conſideration of the ſeverity of the Diſcipline of the Primitive Church. The author, in his Preface, having obſerved the miſtakes men have run into with reſpect to the great buſineſs of repentance and converſion, tells us, his deſign in theſe Eſſays, is, 'to endeavour briefly to ſet this great and 'important matter in its true light, from the analogy 'of Scripture, and from the ſenſe of the pureſt ages 'of the Primitive Church: to ſhew, that at Baptiſm 'God always beſtows that grace, which is neceſſary 'to enable men to perform their duty; and that to 'thoſe, who are baptiſed in their infancy, this grace 'is ſealed and aſſured at Confirmation: that from 'henceforward men are bound, with that aſſiſtance, 'to live in the conſtant practice of their known duty, 'and are not to expect (except in extraordinary caſes) 'any extraordinary, much leſs irreſiſtible grace, to 'preſerve them in their duty, or to convert them 'from ſin: that if after this they fall into any great 'wickedneſs, they are bound to a proportionably 'great and particular repentance: and that, as the 'Goſpel hath given ſufficient aſſurance of ſuch re-'pentance being accepted, to comfort and encourage 'all true penitents; ſo it has ſufficiently ſhewn the 'difficulty of it at all times, and the extreme danger of 'it when late, to deter men from delaying it when 'they are convinced of its neceſſity, and from adding 'to their ſins when they hope to have them forgiven.' Biſhop Hoadly (9) mentions theſe Eſſays, and the Reflections on Amyntor (10), not to put them upon a level with the author's other performances, but only as having upon them the plain marks of a Chriſtian frame of mind, and as proofs of his knowledge in the writings of thoſe early ages, even at his firſt ſetting out into the world. Mr. Whiſton (11) eſteems theſe Eſſays the moſt ſerious treatiſe Dr. Clarke ever wrote, and which, with a little correction, will ſtill be very uſeful in all Chriſtian families. Upon this occaſion Mr. Whiſton tells us, he remembers, he once told Dr. Clarke, after he had been long at St. James's, and about the Court, that 'he doubted he was not now 'ſo ſerious, and good a Chriſtian, as he had been in 'the days of Hermas.' This, he ſays, Dr. Clarke readily underſtood to mean the time of his writing theſe three practical Eſſays, in which he had very often quoted that excellent, but deſpiſed, book of Primitive Chriſtianity: The Shepherd of Hermas. There have been five editions of theſe Eſſays.

[G] His Reflexions on——Amyntor.] The whole title is: Some Reflections on that part of a book, called Amyntor, or, A Defence of Milton's life, which relates to the Writings of the Primitive Fathers, and the Canon of the New Teſtament: In a Letter to a Friend. The author of Amyntor, it is well known, was the famous Mr. Toland, and the propoſitions, maintained therein, which Dr. Clarke thought moſt to deſerve conſideration, are theſe three: Firſt, That The books aſcribed to the Diſciples and Companions of the Apoſtles, which are ſtill extant, and at this time thought genuine, and of great authority; ſuch as, the epiſtle of Clemens to the Corinthians, the epiſtles of Ignatius, the epiſtle of Paraphraſe on the Goſpel of St. Matthew, which was ſoon followed by thoſe on St. Mark, Luke, and John [H]. Biſhop Moore gave our author the Rectory of Drayton, near Norwich, and procured for him a pariſh in that city; both together of very inconſiderable value: and theſe he ſerved himſelf in the ſeaſon when the Biſhop reſided at Norwich. His preaching was, at firſt, without notes, and ſo continued till he became Rector of St. James's (b). In the year 1704, he was appointed to preach Mr. Boyle's Lecture; and the ſubject he choſe was, The Being and Attributes of God [I]: in which he

of Polycarp to the Philippians, the Paſtor of Hermas, and the epiſtle of Barnabas, &c. are all very eaſily proved to be ſpurious, and fraudulently impoſed upon the credulous. Secondly, That it is the eaſieſt taſk in the world, to ſhew the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the writers of theſe books: that Barnabas has many ridiculous paſſages; and by ſaying, that the Apoſtles before their converſion were the greateſt ſinners in nature, we are robbed of an argument we draw from their integrity and ſimplicity againſt infidels: that the Paſtor of Hermas is the ſilliеſt book in the world: and that Ignatius ſays, the virginity of Mary was a ſecret to the devil; which, Dr. Clarke ſuppoſes, Mr. Toland cites as a ridiculous ſaying. Thirdly, That they, who think theſe books genuine, ought to receive them into the Canon of Scripture, ſince the reputed authors of them were the companions and fellow-labourers of the Apoſtles, as well as St. Mark and St. Luke, which is the only reaſon (Mr. T. ever heard of) why theſe two Evangeliſts are thought inſpired. Theſe are the principal aſſertions of the author of Amyntor; in oppoſition to which Dr. Clarke advances, and maintains, the three following propoſitions: Firſt, that, 'Though we are not infallibly certain, that the Epiſtles of Clemens, Ignatius, Polycarp and Barnabas, with the Paſtor of Hermas, are genuine; yet that they are generally believed to be ſo, upon very great authority, and with very good reaſon.' Secondly, that therefore 'Though they are not received as of the ſame authority with the Canonical Books of the New Teſtament, yet they ought to have a proportionable veneration paid to them, both with reſpect to the authors, and to the writings themſelves.' Thirdly, that 'Neither the belief of the genuineneſs of theſe books, nor the reſpect paid to them as ſuch, does in the leaſt diminiſh from the authority of the New Teſtament, or tend to make the number of the Canonical Books uncertain or precarious.' This Tract was firſt publiſhed, without a name, in 1699, and ſince added to Dr. Clarke's Letter to Mr. Dodwell, &c.

[H] His Paraphraſes on the Four Goſpels.] Among the many excellent Commentaries and Expoſitions upon the Books of the Holy Scripture, there had been none, wherein the text of the New Teſtament is fully paraphraſed with brevity and plainneſs. Eraſmus's performance of this kind is very elegant and judicious: but his explications are large, having frequent digreſſions: in many places he indulges allegorical interpretations; and, beſides, the beauty of his work is very much loſt in our tranſlation. The eminent and learned Biſhop Hall wrote a pious Expoſition upon particular difficult texts; but, becauſe it was only upon particular texts, the deſign itſelf allowed him not to regard tranſitions, and to make his paraphraſe one continued uninterrupted diſcourſe. Dr. Hammond has with great pains collected all the aſſiſtances of ancient and modern learning, and with great ſucceſs applied them to the explication of the New Teſtament. But thoſe, who juſtly admire his great learning and ſkill in interpreting, yet complain of the obſcurity and perplexedneſs of his ſtyle, which makes his Paraphraſe ſomewhat difficult, and of leſs general uſe: and beſides, it was never printed by itſelf without his large notes. Dr. Patrick, Biſhop of Ely, has, with admirable learning and judgment, brought this way of writing to perfection, in his Paraphraſe upon ſome books of the Old Teſtament; and all, who deſire to underſtand the Scriptures fully, will ever wiſh he had gone through all the writings both of the Old and New Teſtament in the ſame way. Others, who have written good expoſitions upon the Holy Scriptures, have either made large commentaries, of leſs general and conſtant uſe; or have inſiſted chiefly on ſuch critical obſervations, as are proper only for the learned. Dr. Clarke tells us (12), he has 'endeavoured in theſe papers to expreſs the full 'ſenſe of the Evangeliſts in the plaineſt words, and 'to continue the ſenſe without interruption by the 'cleareſt tranſitions he could. He has all along con-'ſulted the beſt Expoſitors, and ſelected out of every 'one what ſeemed to diſcover the moſt natural 'meaning of the text: and where any thing remark-'able offered itſelf to his thoughts, different from 'what he met with in Commentators, he ſet it down 'in ſhort notes in the margin. But other critical 'obſervations he has generally omitted (excepting 'what uſe is made of them in the Paraphraſe) that 'he might not ſwell the marginal notes into a com-'mentary, and trouble the reader with repeating 'what others had ſaid already.' Of how great benefit theſe Paraphraſes have been, and alway will be, to thoſe Engliſh readers, who have ſenſe and goodneſs enough to be pleaſed with a juſt repreſentation of the true meaning of what is recorded in the Goſpel, we need not ſay. And we cannot but expreſs our wiſhes, that he had purſued his original deſign, which was to have compleated the work upon the whole New Teſtament. We are told (13), he had actually begun his Paraphraſe upon the Acts of the Apoſtles: but ſomething accidental interrupted the execution. And it is now only to be lamented, that he did not afterwards reſume and complete ſo excellent a work; which his friends often preſſed upon him, and to which he would ſometimes anſwer, That it was made leſs neceſſary by the labours of ſeveral worthy and learned perſons, ſince the publication of his work upon the Four Goſpels. There have been ſeveral editions of Dr. Clarke's Paraphraſe.

(13) Account, &c. ibid.

[I] His Sermons on the Being and Attributes of God.] Theſe, together with his Sermons on the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion, are thrown into continued Diſcourſes, and printed together, under the general title of A Diſcourſe concerning the Being and Attributes of God, the Obligations of Natural Religion, and the Truth and Certainty of the Chriſtian Revelation, in anſwer to Mr. Hobbes, Spinoza, the author of the Oracles of Reaſon, and other deniers of Natural and Revealed Religion: being ſixteen Sermons, preached in the cathedral church of St. Paul, in the years 1704 and 1705, at the Lecture founded by the Honourable Robert Boyle, Eſq; The particular title of the firſt eight ſermons is, A Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. There having been already publiſhed, many and good books, to prove the Being and Attributes of God, our author choſe to contract what was requiſite for him to ſay upon this ſubject, into as narrow a compaſs, and to expreſs what he had to offer, in as few words, as he could with perſpicuity. For which reaſon, he confined himſelf to one only method, or continued thread of arguing; which he endeavoured ſhould be as near to mathematical, as the nature of ſuch a diſcourſe would allow: omitting ſome other arguments, which he could not diſcern to be ſo evidently concluſive: 'Becauſe (to uſe his own words) it ſeems not to be 'at any time for the real advantage of truth, to uſe 'arguments in its behalf founded only on ſuch hypo-'theſes, as the adverſaries apprehended they cannot 'be compelled to grant (14).' Yet he has not made it his buſineſs to oppoſe any of thoſe arguments, becauſe he thought it not the beſt way 'for any one to 'recommend his own performance, by endeavouring 'to diſcover the imperfection of others, who are 'engaged in the ſame deſign with himſelf, of pro-'moting the intereſt of true religion and virtue (15).' Dr. Clarke's Sermons at Mr. Boyle's Lecture were printed in two diſtinct volumes; the former in 1705, and the latter in 1706. They have been ſince printed in one volume, and have paſſed through ſeveral veral editions. In the fourth and fifth editions were added ſeveral letters to Dr. Clarke from A Gentleman in Glouceſterſhire *, relating to the Demonſtration, &c. with the Doctor's Anſwers. In the ſixth and ſeventh editions were added, A Diſcourſe concerning the Connexion of the Prophecies in the Old Teſtament, and the Application of them to Chriſt; and An Anſwer to a ſeventh Letter concerning the Argument à Priori. Dr. Clarke having endeavoured to ſhew, that the Being of a God may be demonſtrated by arguments à Priori (in which attempt, whether ſucceſsful or not, ſurely he may be excuſed) is unluckily involved in the cenſure a very great wit has paſſed upon this method of reaſoning, in the following lines, which he has put into the mouth of one of his Dunces, addreſſing himſelf to the Goddeſs:

* Dr. Joſeph Butler. See his article.

Let others creep by timid ſteps and ſlow,
On plain experience lay foundations low,
By common ſenſe to common knowledge bred,
And, laſt, to nature's cauſe thro' nature led.
All-ſeeing in thy miſts, we want no guide,
Mother of arrogance, and ſource of pride!
We nobly take the high Priori road,
And reaſon downward, 'till we doubt of God (16).

(16) Dunciad, B. iv. l. 455.

Upon which we have the following note: 'Thoſe, 'who, from the effects in this viſible world, deduce 'the eternal power and Godhead of the Firſt Cauſe, 'though they cannot attain to an adequate idea of 'the Deity, yet diſcover ſo much of him, as enables 'them to ſee the end of their creation, and the means 'of their happineſs; whereas they, who take this 'high Priori road (as Hobbes, Spinoza, Des Cartes, 'and ſome better reaſoners) for one that goes right, 'ten loſe themſelves in miſts, or ramble after viſions, 'which deprive them of all ſight of their end, and 'miſlead them in the choice of wrong means.' Mr. Pope would, perhaps, have ſpared his better Reaſoners, and not have joined them with ſuch company, had he recollected our author's apology for uſing the argument à Priori. The argument à poſteriori (he tells us) is indeed by far the moſt generally uſeful argument, moſt eaſy to be underſtood, and in ſome degree ſuited to all capacities; and therefore it ought always to be diſtinctly inſiſted upon. But foraſmuch as atheiſtical writers have ſometimes oppoſed the Being and Attributes of God by ſuch metaphyſical reaſonings, as can no otherwiſe be obviated, than by arguing à Priori; therefore this manner of arguing alſo is uſeful and neceſſary in its proper place (17). Biſhop Hoadly, ſpeaking of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration, &c. tells us (18), he has 'laid the 'foundations of true religion too deep and ſtrong, to 'be ſhaken either by the ſuperſtition of ſome, or the 'infidelity of others:' That 'He choſe particularly 'to conſider the arguings of Spinoza and Hobbes, the 'moſt plauſible patrons of the ſyſtem of Fate and Neceſſity; a ſyſtem, which, by deſtroying all true freedom of action in any intelligent being, at the ſame 'time deſtroys all that can be ſtyled virtue, or praiſe-'worthy:' That, 'this being a ſubject, into which 'all the ſubtilties and quirks of Metaphyſicks had 'entered, and thrown their uſual obſcurity and intricacy; the difficulty lay in clearing away this rubbiſh of confuſion; in introducing a language that 'could be underſtood; in clothing the cleareſt ideas 'in this plain and manly language; and in concluding nothing but from ſuch evidence as amounts to 'Demonſtration:' That 'He began with ſelf-evident 'propoſitions; from them advanced to ſuch as received their proof from the former; and in theſe 'took no ſtep till he had ſecured the way before him:' That 'Throughout the whole no word is uſed, but 'what is intelligible to all who are at all verſed in 'ſuch ſubjects, and what expreſſes the clear idea in the 'mind of him who makes uſe of it:' And that 'All 'is one regular building, erected upon an immoveable 'foundation, and riſing up, from one ſtage to another, 'with equal ſtrength and dignity.' Let us hear Mr. Whiſton's opinion in relation to this performance of Dr. Clarke's. He tells us (19), when the author brought him his book, he was in his garden over-againſt St. Peter's College in Cambridge, where he then lived. 'Now I perceived, ſays he, that in theſe 'Sermons he had dealt a great deal in abſtract and metaphyſick reaſonings. I therefore aſked him how he 'ventured into ſuch ſubtilties, which I never durſt 'meddle with? And ſhewing him a nettle, or the like 'contemptible weed, in my garden, I told him, that 'weed contained better arguments for the Being and 'Attributes of God than all his Metaphyſicks. He 'confeſſed it to be ſo; but alledged for himſelf, that, 'ſince ſuch Philoſophers as Hobbes and Spinoza had 'made uſe of thoſe kind of ſubtilties againſt, he 'thought proper to ſhew, that the like way of reaſoning might be better made uſe on the ſide of religion. Which reaſon, or excuſe, I allowed not to 'be inconſiderable. As to myſelf, I confeſs I have 'long eſteemed ſuch kind of arguments as the moſt 'ſubtle, but the leaſt ſatisfactory of all others whatſoever. And my own opinion is, that, perhaps, 'Angels, or ſome of the orders of rational beings ſuperior to them, may be able to reaſon a great way 'à Priori, as it is called, and from Metaphyſicks, to 'their own and others ſatisfaction; but I do not perceive that we men, in our preſent imperfect ſtate, 'can do ſo.' Whatever this honeſt gentleman could, or could not do, it is certain, that Dr. Clarke, and other ingenious men, of clear heads and ſound judgments, have reaſoned a great way à Priori; and that metaphyſical reaſoning in ſuch hands is not only the moſt ſatisfactory, but is the higheſt and nobleſt effort of the human underſtanding. We ſhall conclude this remark, with juſt mentioning ſome pieces written for, and againſt, Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. It was animadverted upon by Mr. Edmund Law *, in his Notes upon Archbiſhop King's Eſſay on the Origin of Evil, tranſlated from the Latin. This occaſioned a piece intitled, A Defence of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God: Wherein is particularly conſidered the Nature of Space, Duration, and neceſſary Exiſtence: Being an Anſwer to a late book intitled, A Tranſlation of Dr. King's Origin of Evil, and ſome other Objections: Together with a Compendium of A Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, London, 1732, in 8*vo*. Mr. Law vindicated his Remarks in a Poſtſcript to the ſecond edition of Dr. King's Eſſay: which occaſioned, A ſecond Defence of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God: In Anſwer to a Poſtſcript, &c. By the author of the firſt Defence, London, 1732, in 8*vo*. The ſame year was publiſhed a pamphlet, intitled, Dr. Clarke's notion of Space examined: In vindication of the tranſlation of Archbiſhop King's Origin of Evil: Being an Anſwer to two late pamphlets intitled, A Defence, &c. Mr. John Jackſon publiſhed a piece, intitled, The Exiſtence and Unity of God, proved from his Nature and Attributes: Being a Vindication of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God, London, 1734, in 8*vo*. The ſame year appeared two pamphlets, printed at Cambridge; one intitled, An Enquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, Immenſity, and Eternity, as alſo the Self-Exiſtence, neceſſary Exiſtence, and Unity of the Divine Nature, by Edmund Law, M A. the other intitled, An Examination of Dr. Clarke's Notion of Space, by Joſeph Clarke, M. A. Mr. John Clarke, author of the two Defences of Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration, having publiſhed a third, Mr. Joſeph Clarke publiſhed A farther Examination of Dr. Clarke's Notions of Space, with ſome Conſiderations on the poſſibility of Eternal Creation: In Reply to Mr. John Clarke's third Defence, &c. To which are added, ſome Remarks on Mr. Jackſon's Exceptions to Dr. Clarke's Notions of Space examined in his Exiſtence and Unity, &c.

[K] On the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion.] In theſe Diſcourſes he laid the foundations of Morality deep, in the mutual relations of things and perſons one to another; in the unalterable fitneſs of ſome actions, and the unfitneſs of others; and in the will of the great Creator of all things, evident from his making man capable of ſeeing theſe relations and

About this time, or not much later, Mr. Whiſton tells us (c), he diſcovered, that Mr. Clarke had been looking into the primitive writers, and began to ſuſpect, that the Athanaſian doctrine of the Trinity was not the doctrine of the early ages [L]. In 1706, his Patron Biſhop Moore, by his intereſt, procured for him the Rectory of St. Bennet, Paul's Wharf, in London (d). The ſame year, he publiſhed his Letter to Mr. Dodwell, in anſwer to that author's Epiſtolary Diſcourſe concerning the Immortality of the Soul [M]. The ſame year, likewiſe, he tranſlated Sir Iſaac Newton's Treatiſe of Opticks into elegant Lain [N]. He was now brought by his Patron to Court, and recommended to the favour of Queen Anne, who appointed him one of her Chaplains in Ordinary; and, ſoon after, in conſideration of his great merit, and at the requeſt of the Biſhop, preſented him to the Rectory of St. James's, Weſtminſter [O]: from which time he left off his former way of preaching without notes, and made it his buſineſs to compoſe, and write down, as accurate ſermons as he could (e). Upon his advancement to this ſtation in 1709, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity at Cambridge, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf, upon that occaſion, by the performance of a remarkable public exerciſe (f) [P]. The ſame year, he reviſed and corrected Mr. Whiſton's tranſlation of the Apoſtolical

this fitneſs, of judging concerning them, and of acting agreeably to that judgment. He then proceeded to demonſtrate the Chriſtian Religion to be worthy of God, from its internal evidence, taken from the perfect agreeableneſs of its main deſign to the light of nature, and to all the moral obligations of eternal reaſon; without which agreeableneſs, all the arguments in the world could never conclude in its favour: and, after this, to prove it to have been actually revealed to the world by God, from the external evidence of prophecy going before it, and of miraculous works performed in expreſs confirmation of it. Theſe Sermons, together with thoſe on the Being and Attributes of God, every Chriſtian in this country, as Biſhop Hoadly well obſerves (20), 'ought to eſteem 'as his treaſure; as they contain the true ſtrength, 'not only of natural, but of revealed religion: which, 'if ever it be removed from ſuch a foundation, or 'ſeparated from ſuch an alliance with reaſon and un-'corrupted nature, will not long ſubſiſt in the belief 'of underſtanding perſons, after ſuch a ſeparation. 'And, therefore, What God hath joined together, let 'not man put aſunder.'

[L] He began to ſuſpect, that the Athanaſian doctrine of the Trinity was not the doctrine of the early ages.] Whether Mr. (Sir Iſaac) Newton had given Mr. Clarke any intimations of that nature, or whether it aroſe from enquiries of his own, Mr. Whiſton, who gives us this account (21), cannot directly inform us; though he inclines to the latter. This only he remembers to have heard Mr. Clarke ſay, that he never read the Athanaſian Creed, in his pariſh, at or near Norwich, but once, and that was only by miſtake, at a time when it was not appointed by the Rubrick.

[M] His Letter to Mr. Dodwell, in anſwer to that author's Epiſtolary Diſcourſe concerning the Immortality of the Soul.] The whole title is, A Letter to Mr. Dodwell; wherein all the arguments in his Epiſtolary Diſcourſe againſt the immortality of the ſoul are particularly anſwered, and the judgment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly repreſented. Mr. Dodwell's book, againſt which this is levelled, is intitled, An Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, proving from the Scriptures, and the firſt Fathers, that the ſoul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleaſure of God, to puniſhment or to reward, by its union with the divine baptiſmal Spirit: Wherein is proved, that none have the power of giving this divine immortalizing Spirit, ſince the Apoſtles, but only the Biſhops. The miſchievous tendency of this doctrine, as it was backed by the great name of the author in the learned world, made it more neceſſary that an anſwer ſhould be given to what, from another hand, might perhaps have been received as a deſigned banter upon both natural and revealed religion. Mr. Clarke was thought the moſt proper perſon for this work. 'And he did it' (ſays the Biſhop of Wincheſter) 'in ſo excellent a man-'ner, both with regard to the philoſophical part, and 'to the opinions of ſome of the primitive writers, 'upon whom this doctrine was fixed, that it gave 'univerſal ſatisfaction (22).' But this controverſy did not ſtop here. For Mr. Anthony Collins, commaking in as a ſecond to Mr. Dodwell, went much farther into the philoſophy of the diſpute, and indeed ſeemed to produce all that could plauſibly be ſaid againſt the immateriality of the ſoul, as well as the liberty of human actions (23). This opened a larger field of controverſy, into which Mr. Clarke entered, and wrote with ſuch a ſpirit of clearneſs and demonſtration, as ſhewed him greatly ſuperior to his adverſaries both in metaphyſical and natural knowledge. 'And I amperſuaded, ſays Biſhop Hoadly (24), that, as 'what he has written in this controverſy comprehends 'the little that the Antients had ſaid well, and adds 'ſtill more evidence than ever clearly appeared be-'fore, and all in words that have a meaning to them; 'it will remain the ſtandard of good ſenſe on that 'ſide of the queſtion, on which he ſpent ſo many of 'his thoughts, as upon one of his favourite points.' Mr. Clarke's piece was ſoon followed by four Defences of it in four ſeveral Letters to the author of A Letter to the learned Mr. Henry Dodwell; containing ſome Remarks on a (pretended) Demonſtration of the immateriality and natural immortality of the ſoul, in Mr. Clarke's Anſwer to his late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, &c.

[N] He tranſlated Sir Iſaac Newton's Opticks into elegant Latin.] In the midſt of his other labours, he found time alſo to ſhew his regard to mathematical and phyſical ſtudies, and his exact knowledge and ſkill in them. And his natural affection and capacity for theſe ſtudies were not a little improved by the particular friendſhip of the incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton; at whoſe requeſt, Biſhop Hoadly tells us (25), he tranſlated that excellent performance, and ſent it all over Europe in a plainer and leſs ambiguous ſtyle, than the Engliſh language will permit. And here it may be proper to add, that, after the death of that great man, Dr. Clarke vindicated his doctrine concerning the proportion of velocity and force of bodies in motion, againſt the objections of ſome late Mathematicians, in a ſhort, plain, and maſterly letter (26). Nor muſt it be forgotten, that Sir Iſaac Newton was ſo particularly pleaſed with our author's verſion of his Opticks, that he preſented him with the ſum of five hundred pounds, or 100 l. for each child, the Doctor having then five children (27).

Apoſtolical Conſtitutions into Engliſh [Q]. In 1712, he publiſhed a beautiful edition of Cæſar's Commentaries [R]. Soon after this, Dr. Clarke became engaged in a warm controverſy, occaſioned by the publication of his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity [S]; of

'can be no religion.' The Doctor's Theſis was an elaborate diſcourſe upon the firſt of theſe two queſtions. Dr. James, then Royal Profeſſor of Divinity, a very learned and acute diſputant, exerted himſelf more than uſual upon this occaſion; and, after having ſifted every part of Dr. Clarke's Theſis with the ſtricteſt nicety, preſſed him with all the force of ſyllogiſm in its various forms. To the former our reſpondent made an extempore reply, in a continued diſcourſe for near half an hour; in which, without any heſitation either for thoughts or language, he took off the force of all that the Profeſſor had ſaid, in ſuch a manner, that many of the auditors declared themſelves aſtoniſhed, and owned that, if they had not been within ſight of him, they ſhould have ſuppoſed he had read every word of his reply out of a paper. After this, in the courſe of the ſyllogiſtical diſputation, he guarded ſo well againſt the arts, which the Profeſſor was maſter of in perfection; replied ſo readily to the greateſt difficulties ſuch an objector could propoſe; and preſſed him ſo cloſe and hard with clear and intelligible anſwers, that, perhaps, never was ſuch a conflict heard in the ſchools; nor any diſputation kept up with ſuch ſpirit, and ended with equal honour to the reſpondent. The Profeſſor, who was a man of humour as well as learning, ſaid to him aloud, towards the end of the diſputation, Probe me exacuiſti, or (as others think) exercuiſti: which was looked upon as a very high compliment, in his humorous way of ſpeaking. And the learned members of the Univerſity, who had with pleaſure attended to every part of the diſputation, went away diſcourſing to one another of the unuſual entertainment they had had in the ſchools; and particularly admiring, that, after an abſence of ſo many years, and a long courſe of buſineſs of quite another nature, they heard him now handling the ſubjects he undertook in ſuch a maſterly manner, as if this ſort of academical exerciſe had been his conſtant employment; and with ſuch a fluency and purity of expreſſion, as if he had been accuſtomed to no other language in converſation but Latin (29). Mr. Whiſton tells us (30), in the words of an unknown admirer of Dr. Clarke, who was preſent at this famous act, that 'Every creature was wrapt 'up into ſilence and aſtoniſhment, and thought the 'performance truly admirable.' In the courſe of this act, where I was preſent, adds Mr. Whiſton (31), Profeſſor James, who knew of the intimacy of Dr. Clarke and me; knew alſo that I was a profeſſed Euſebian *, and ſuſpected Dr. Clarke to be a latent one; digreſſed from one of the doctor's queſtions, and preſſed him hard to condemn one of the opinions I had juſt then publiſhed in my Sermons and Eſſays; which book he held in his hand, when he was in the chair. I ſuppoſe it might be this, that our Saviour had no human ſoul, but that the divine Λόγος, or Word, ſupplied its place. This was done in ſuch a rude, indecent, and almoſt profane manner, as occaſioned the following Tetraſtick, which was produced by Dr. Bentley, when Dr. Clarke and I ſupped with him that every evening:

However Dr. Clarke, who I believe, had not then particularly examined that point, did prudently avoid either the approbation or condemnation of it.

[Q] He reviſed and corrected Mr. Whiſton's Tranſlation of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions into Engliſh.] Mr. Whiſton tells us (32), that, his own ſtudies having been chiefly upon things, and having rendered him incapable of being alſo a critick in words or languages, he deſired his great friend and great critick Dr. Clarke, to reviſe that tranſlation. 'We 'read (ſays he) a great part of it over together; as 'he corrected the reſt by himſelf, and ſent me the 'corrections: ſome or all of which I have now by 'me, under his own hand. I perceived their con'tents made then a very great impreſſion upon him; 'though he ſeemed, I know not how, to have ſuf'fered ſome part of that impreſſion gradually to wear 'off afterward. When he had reviſed and corrected 'the whole, and found about ten or twelve places, 'which he heſitated about, he recommended it to 'me to go to our great and common friend Dr. 'Smalridge (with whom my acquaintance commen'ced about the ſame time it did with Dr. Clarke, if 'not a little ſooner) for the laſt correction of thoſe 'more difficult places: who as he was a very great 'admirer of the book itſelf, ſo was he pleaſed to ex'amine and correct my verſion of it, as to every one 'of thoſe places. Theſe were the two perſons inti'mated, but not named by me, on this account, in 'the advertiſement to the firſt of my four volumes of 'Primitive Chriſtianity revived: where I juſtly call 'Dr. Clarke, one excellently ſkilled in ſuch matters and 'an accurate hand; and Dr. Smalridge, a very learned 'and judicious perſon.'

[R] He publiſhed a beautiful edition of Cæſar's Commentaries.] It is intitled, C. Julii Cæſaris quæ extant, accuratiſſime cum libris editis & MSS. optimis collata, recognita, & correcta: Acceſſerunt Annotationes Samuelis Clarke, S. T. P. Item indices locorum, rerumque & verborum, utiliſſimæ. It was printed in 1712, in folio; and afterwards, in 1720, in 8vo. It was dedicated to the great Duke of Marlborough, at a time when his unequalled victories and ſucceſſes had raiſed his glory to the higheſt pitch abroad, and leſſened his intereſt and favour at home (33). In the publication of this book, Dr. Clarke took particular care of the punctuation, or a proper diſtribution of each ſentence into its conſtituent members: an exactneſs too much neglected by learned men, though abſolutely neceſſary for preſerving the perſpicuity, and even beauty, of an author's language. In the annotations, he ſelected what appeared the beſt and moſt judicious in other editors, with ſome corrections and emendations of his own interſperſed. He acknowledges himſelf particularly obliged to the learned Dr. Richard Bentley, for the uſe of a manuſcript in the King's Library; to the Rev. Dr. Robert Cannon, for ſome various readings, tranſcribed from the Muſeum of Iſaac Voſſius; but different from thoſe, which are inſerted in the Amſterdam edition of Cæſar, with the notes of Dionyſius Voſſius; and laſtly, to Dr. John Moore, Biſhop of Ely, for a manuſcript, uſed by Dr. Davis in his edition of Cæſar, and by him called the Norwich manuſcript *. Mr. Addiſon takes notice of Dr. Clarke's folio edition of Cæſar's Commentaries in the following words: 'The new edition, which is given 'us of Cæſar's Commentaries, has already been taken 'notice of in foreign Gazettes, and is a work that 'does honour to the Engliſh preſs. It is no wonder, 'that an edition ſhould be very correct, which has 'paſſed through the hands of one of the moſt accurate, learned, and judicious writers this age has produced. 'The beauty of the paper, of the character, and of 'the ſeveral cuts, with which this noble work is il'luſtrated, makes it the fineſt book that I have ever 'ſeen; and is a true inſtance of the Engliſh genius, 'which, though it does not come the firſt into any 'art, generally carries it to greater heights than any 'other country in the world (34).'

of which notice was taken, and complaint made, by the Lower Houſe of Convocation in 1714 [T]: but the affair ſoon ended, upon the Members of the Upper Houſe declaring of our bleſſed Saviour, according to the Scriptures, proved and explained. The ſubject of this book, the author tells us (35), 'is a doctrine no way affecting 'the particular conſtitution, order, or external go- 'vernment of the Church, but in general of great im- 'portance in religion; a matter not to be treated of 'ſlightly and careleſsly, as it were by accident only, 'or after the manner of ſuperficial controverſies about 'words, or of particular occaſional queſtions con- 'cerning the meaning of ſingle ambiguous texts; 'but which ought, when diſcourſed upon at all, to 'be examined thoroughly on all ſides, by a ſerious 'ſtudy of the whole Scripture, and by taking care 'that the explication be conſiſtent with itſelf in every 'part.' It is divided into three parts. The firſt is, A Collection and Explication of all the Texts in the New Teſtament, relating to the doctrine of the Trinity. In the ſecond part, The foregoing doctrine is ſet forth at large, and explained in particular and diſtinct propoſitions. And in the third, The principal paſſages in the Liturgy of the Church of England, relating to the doctrine of the Trinity, are conſidered. The Biſhop of Winchester applauds our author's method of proceeding, in forming his own ſentiments upon ſo important a point. 'He knew, and all men agreed, 'that it was a matter of mere revelation: he did not 'therefore retire into his cloſet, and ſet himſelf to in- 'vent and forge a plauſible hypotheſis, which might 'fit eaſily upon his own mind. He had not recourſe 'to abſtract and metaphyſical reaſonings, to cover or 'patronize any ſyſtem he might have embraced before. 'But, as a Chriſtian, he laid open the New Teſta- 'ment before him. He ſearched out every text, in 'which mention was made of the three Perſons, or 'of any of them. He accurately examined the 'meaning of the words uſed about every one of 'them; and by the beſt rules of Grammar and Cri- 'tique, and by his ſkill in language, he endeavoured 'to fix plainly what was declared about every perſon, 'and what was not (36).' 'I am far from taking 'upon me, adds the Biſhop, to determine, in ſo dif- 'ficult a queſtion, between Dr. Clarke, and thoſe 'who made replies to him. The debate ſoon grew 'very warm; and in a little time ſeemed to reſt prin- 'cipally upon him, and one particular adverſary (*), 'very ſkilful in the management of a debate, and 'very learned and well verſed in the writings of the 'ancient Fathers.——This I hope I may be allowed 'to ſay, that every Chriſtian Divine, and Layman, 'ought to pay his thanks to Dr. Clarke, for the me- 'thod into which he brought this diſpute, and for that 'collection of texts of the New Teſtament, by 'which at laſt it muſt be decided, on which ſide ſo- 'ever the truth may be ſuppoſed to lie. And let me 'add this one word more, that, ſince men of ſuch 'thought, and ſuch learning, have ſhewn the world, 'in their own example, how widely the moſt honeſt 'enquirers after truth may differ upon ſuch ſubjects; 'this, methinks, ſhould a little abate our mutual cen- 'ſures, and a little take off from our poſitiveneſs 'about the neceſſity of explaining, in this or that one 'determinate ſenſe, the ancient paſſages relating to 'points of ſo ſublime a nature (37).' His Lordſhip concludes what he had to ſay upon this ſubject, with aſſuring us, 'that from the time of Dr. Clarke's pub- 'liſhing this book, to the day of his death, he found 'no reaſon, as far as he was able to judge, to alter 'the notions which he had there profeſſed, concern- 'ing the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, towards any 'of thoſe ſchemes, which ſeemed to him to derogate 'from the honour of the Father on one ſide, or from 'that of the Son and Spirit on the other. This (adds 'the Biſhop) I thought proper juſt to mention, as what 'all his friends know to be the truth (38).' Some time before the publication of Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, a meſſage was ſent him from the Lord Godolphin, and others of Queen Anne's Miniſters, importing, 'that the affairs of the public 'were with difficulty then kept in the hands of thoſe, 'who were at all for liberty; that it was therefore an 'unſeaſonable time for the publication of a book, 'which would make a great noiſe and diſturbance; 'and that therefore they deſired him to forbear, till a 'fitter opportunity ſhould offer itſelf;' which meſſage Dr. Clarke had no regard to, but went on, according to the dictates of his conſcience, with the publication of his book (39). Since Dr. Clarke's death, a third edition of this book has been printed, with very great additions, left under the author's own hand, ready prepared for the preſs. As it gave occaſion to a great number of books and pamphlets on the ſubject, written by himſelf and others, we ſhall ſubjoin a liſt of thoſe publiſhed by our author, referring, for the reſt, to a Pamphlet intitled, An Account of all the conſiderable books and pamphlets, that have been written on either ſide, in the Controverſy concerning the Trinity, ſince the year 1712. In which is alſo contained an account of the pamphlets written this laſt year on each ſide by the Diſſenters, to the end of the year 1719, London, 1720, in 8vo. VIII. Dr. Clarke's Replies to the author of three Letters to Dr. Clarke, from a Clergyman of the Church of England, concerning his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity. The Letters and Replies publiſhed together, by the author of the Letters; London 1714, in 8vo.

preſentation. Dr. Clarke drew up a Reply to this extract, dated June the 26th: which, it ſeems, was preſented to ſome of the Biſhops; but (for what reaſon we are not told) was not laid before the Houſe. After this, there appearing, in almoſt the whole Upper Houſe, a great diſpoſition to prevent diſſenſions and diviſions, by coming to a temper in this matter; Dr. Clarke was prevailed upon to lay before the Houſe a paper, dated July the 2d, ſetting forth: 1. That 'his opinion was, that the Son of God was eternally 'begotten by the eternal incomprehenſible power and 'will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit was 'likewiſe eternally derived from the Father, by or 'through the Son, according to the eternal incom'prehenſible power and will of the Father.' 2. That, 'Before his book, intitled, The Scripture Doctrine, '&c. was publiſhed, he did indeed preach two or 'three ſermons upon this ſubject; but, ſince the book 'was publiſhed, he had never preached upon this 'ſubject: and (becauſe he thought it not fair to pro'poſe particular opinions, where there is not liberty 'of anſwering) he was willing to promiſe (as indeed he 'intended) not to preach any more upon this ſubject.' 3. That 'He did not intend to write any more con'cerning the doctrine of the Trinity: but, if he 'ſhould fail herein, and write any thing hereafter, 'upon this ſubject, contrary to the doctrine of the 'Church of England, he did hereby willingly ſubmit 'himſelf to any ſuch cenſure, as his ſuperiors ſhould 'think fit to paſs upon him.' 4. That, 'Whereas it 'had been confidently reported, that the Athanaſian 'Creed, and the 3d and 4th petitions in the Litany, 'had been omitted in his Church by his direction, he 'did hereby declare, that the 3d and 4th petitions in 'the Litany had never been omitted at all, as far as he 'knew; and that the Athanaſian Creed was never 'omitted at eleven o'clock prayers, but at early prayers 'only, for brevity ſake, at the diſcretion of the cu'rate, and not by his appointment.' 5. That, 'As 'to his private converſation, he was not conſcious to 'himſelf, that he had given any occaſion for thoſe 'reports, which have been ſpread concerning him, 'with relation to this controverſy.' The paper concludes with theſe words: I am ſorry that what I ſincerely intended for the honour and glory of God, and ſo to explain this great myſtery, as to avoid the hereſies in both extremes, ſhould have given any offence to this Synod, and particularly to my Lords the Biſhops. I hope my behaviour for the time to come, with relation hereunto, will be ſuch, as to prevent any future complaints againſt me. After this paper had been laid before the Upper Houſe, Dr. Clarke, being apprehenſive, that if it ſhould be publiſhed ſeparately (as afterwards happened) without any true account of the preceding and following circumſtances, it might be liable to be miſunderſtood in ſome particulars; cauſed an explanation, dated July 5, to be preſented to the Biſhop of London, the next time the Upper Houſe met; ſetting forth: 'That, whereas the paper, laid 'before their Lordſhips the Friday before, was, 'through haſte and want of time, not drawn up with 'ſufficient exactneſs, &c. he thought himſelf indiſ'penſably obliged in conſcience to acquaint their 'Lordſhips; that he did not mean thereby to retract 'any thing he had written, but to declare, that the 'opinion ſet forth at large in his Scripture Doctrine, '&c. is, that The Son was eternally begotten by the eter'nal incomprehenſible Power and Will, &c. and that, 'by declaring he did not intend to write any more 'concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, he did not 'preclude himſelf from a liberty of making any in'offenſive corrections in his former books, if they 'ſhould come to another edition; or from vindicat'ing himſelf from any miſrepreſentations or aſper'ſions, which might poſſibly hereafter be caſt upon 'him on occaſion of this controverſy.' After the delivery of the foregoing explanation to the Biſhop of London, the Upper Houſe reſolved, July the 5th, to proceed no farther upon the extract laid before them by the Lower Houſe; and ordered Dr. Clarke's papers to be entered in the Acts of that Houſe. But the Lower Houſe, not ſo ſatisfied, reſolved, July the 7th, that the paper ſubſcribed by Dr. Clarke, and communicated to them by the Biſhops, does not contain in it any recantation of the heretical aſſertions, and offenſive paſſages, complained of in their Repreſentation, and afterwards produced in their Extract; nor gives ſuch ſatisfaction for the great ſcandal occaſioned thereby, as ought to put a ſtop to any farther examination and cenſure thereof. Thus ended this affair; the moſt authentick account of which we have in a piece, intitled, An Apology for Dr. Clarke, containing an Account of the late Proceedings in Convocation upon his writings concerning the Trinity. London 1714, in 8*vo*. It was written, Mr. Whiſton tells us (40), by a worthy Clergyman in the country (*), a common friend of his and Dr. Clarke's, and contains true copies of the original papers relating to the proceedings of the Convocation and Dr. Clarke, communicated by the Doctor himſelf, and occaſioned by his friend's letter to him, in relation to his conduct; which letter, with Dr. Clarke's anſwer, is printed in the Apology (41). The paper, laid by Dr. Clarke before the Upper Houſe of Convocation, was preſently publiſhed, by an unknown hand, without the explanation that followed it, the reſolution of the Biſhops conſequent thereupon, or the vote of the Lower Houſe, which followed that reſolution. This gave occaſion to a report, both in written and printed news-papers, that Dr. Clarke had RETRACTED what he had written concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. Particularly, in the Political State of Great-Britain for June 1714, were publiſhed theſe words: 'A few 'days after (after the extract was ſent up) Dr. Clarke 'thought fit to make a ſubmiſſion to the Upper Houſe, 'and to deliver to their Lordſhips a paper, wherein 'he PROMISED neither to write nor preach any 'more upon thoſe abſtruſe points: whereby an end 'was put to that portentous affair. And, oh! that 'all Divines would be as wiſe, and ſacrifice their 'private opinions to the peace and unity of the 'Church!' And, in October following, in a book, intitled, The Hiſtory of the Firſt and Second Seſſion of the laſt Parliament, were publiſhed the following words: 'The Upper Houſe of Convocation being 'made ſenſible, that he (Dr. Clarke) had made a 'ſacrifice of his private opinions to the peace and 'unity of the Church; and that by this prudent and 'Chriſtian behaviour, &c.' About the ſame time came out ſeveral other accounts of the proceedings of the Convocation relating this matter; moſt of which ſeemed to repreſent Dr. Clarke as having made ſuch compliances, as could not but be a great diſcouragement to all who placed their religion in a free and impartial ſtudy of the Scriptures. How far Dr. Clarke's conduct upon this occaſion, as repreſented above, will ſerve to juſtify theſe reports, is left to the reader's judgment. In the mean time, impartiality obliges us to ſet down Mr. Whiſton's reflections upon this affair (42). He calls Dr. Clarke's opinion delivered in to the Biſhops (at the head of the paper, recited above) a NEW DECLARATION of his Belief of a ſort of Eternity of the Son and Spirit; the delivery of which Declaration he had heard him long afterwards ſtyle a fooliſh thing: the occaſions of which, he thinks, beſides the ſiniſter motives of human caution, and human fear, were theſe two: Firſt, his own metaphyſick opinion, which he conſtantly and vigorouſly maintained, That any Creature whatſoever might poſſibly have been coeternal with its Creator; and, ſecondly, that Biſhop Smalridge, whoſe opinion was chiefly regarded, had dropped ſome words beforehand, intimating, that, 'As to other of Dr. Clarke's 'metaphyſical notions about the Trinity, he did not 'think it neceſſary to proceed to their condemnation, 'provided he would but declare he believed the eter'nity of the Son of God.' This New Declaration, Mr. Whiſton adds, was made, contrary to the wiſer advice of Dr. Bradford, who would have had Dr. Clarke rather tranſcribe ſome ſuch parts of his own books, as came neareſt to the common doctrine, and ſend them to the Convocation, as ſo far a declaration of his faith: 'Which (ſays Mr. Whiſton) would have 'been a method of proceeding, both more honeſt 'and more unexceptionable.' And Mr. Whiſton is of opinion, there is a great deal of truth in what is ſaid, that Dr. Clarke was prevailed upon to deliver in his new, ſuſpicious, declaration; the true point (he thinks) being SAVE THY SELF AND US: both of which were by this means obtained.

ference with Dr. Smalridge, concerning the Trinity, at Thomas Cartwright's, Esq; at Aynho, in Northamptonshire [U]. In 1715 and 1716, he had a dispute with the celebrated Mr. Leibnitz, relating to the principles of Natural Philosophy and Religion; and a collection of the papers, which passed between them, was published in 1717 [W]. In 1718, a controversy arose concerning the primitive Doxologies, occasioned by an alteration made by Dr. Clarke in those of the singing Psalms [X]. About this time, he was presented by Mr. Lechmere, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to the Mastership of Wigstan Hospital, in Leicester (b). In 1724, he published, in 8vo. seventeen sermons on several occasions, eleven of which were never before printed. In 1727, upon the death of Sir Isaac Newton, he was offered the place of Master of the Mint, which he thought proper to refuse [Y]. In 1728, was published, A Letter from Dr. Clarke to (b) Hist. Mem. p. 61.

[U] He had a conference with Dr. Smalridge concerning the Trinity, &c.] It was proposed, Mr. Whiston tells us (43), by the former, in order to the conviction of the latter. And if any person in England was able to convince upon that head, he thinks, it must have been Dr. Smalridge, who was a thorough master of those original books of Christianity, from whence the arguments were to be taken, and who wanted not sagacity nor good-will to enforce them. However, if Mr. Whiston is to be credited, Dr. Smalridge failed of success, and the company were generally satisfied that the evidence on Dr. Clarke's side was greatly superior to the other.

(43) Hist. Mem. p. 41.

[W] A collection of papers, which passed between Dr. Clarke and Mr. Leibnitz.] To this collection are added, Letters to Dr. Clarke concerning Liberty and Necessity, from a Gentleman (*) of the University of Cambridge; with the Doctor's Answers to them: also remarks upon a book, intitled, A Philosophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty (†). This book is inscribed to her late Majesty Queen Caroline, (then Princess of Wales) who was pleased, the Bishop of Winchester tells us (44), to have the controversy pass through her hands, and was the witness and judge of every step of it. And Dr. Clarke, Mr. Whiston informs us (45), used often to speak with admiration of the Queen's marvellous sagacity and judgment in the several parts of the dispute. It related chiefly to the important and difficult points of liberty and necessity; points, in which Dr. Clarke always excelled, and shewed a superiority to all, whenever they came into private discourse, or public debate. But, as the Bishop of Winchester justly observes (46), he never more excelled, than when he was pressed with the strength his learned adversary was master of; which made him exert all his talents, to set the subject once more in a clear light, to guard it against the evil of metaphysical obscurities, and to give the finishing stroke to what must ever be the foundation of morality in man, and is the sole ground of the accountableness of intelligent creatures for all their actions. 'And as this, adds the Bishop, was the last of Dr. 'Clarke's works relating to a subject, which had 'been, by the writings of cloudy or artful men, rendered so intricate; I shall take the liberty to say, 'with regard to all of the same tendency, from his 'first discourse about the being of God, to these letters; 'that what he has written to clear and illustrate this 'cause, does now stand, and will for ever remain, 'before the world, a lasting monument of a genius, 'which could throw in light where darkness used to 'reign; and force good sense and plain words into 'what was almost the privileged place of obscurity 'and unintelligible sounds. For such, indeed, had 'the subject before us been, under the hands of most 'who had written upon it; either through a desire of 'darkening it by words without meaning, or through 'an inability of discoursing clearly and consistently 'about it.' Mr. Whiston observes (47), that Mr. Leibnitz was pressed so hard by Dr. Clarke, from matter of fact, known laws of motion, and the discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton (who, he tells us, heartily assisted the Doctor,) that he was forced to have recourse to metaphysical subtilties, and to a pre-established harmony of things in his own imagination, which he styles a superior reason; till it was soon seen, that Monsieur Leibnitz's superior reason served to little else, but to confirm the great superiority of experience and Mathematicks above all such metaphysical subtilties whatsoever. 'And I confess, adds Mr. Whis-

'ton, I look upon these letters of Dr. Clarke, as 'among the most useful of his performances in Na-'tural Philosophy.'

[X] He altered the forms of doxology in the singing psalms.] This he did in certain select hymns and psalms, reprinted that year for the use of St. James's parish. The alterations were these:

To God, through Christ, his only Son,
Immortal glory be, &c.

And,

To God, through Christ, his Son, our Lord,
All glory be therefore, &c.

A considerable number of these select psalms and hymns having been dispersed by the Society for promoting of Christian Knowledge, before the alteration of the doxologies was taken notice of, Dr. Clarke was charged with a design of imposing upon the Society; whereas, in truth, the edition of them had been prepared by him for the use of his own parish only, before the Society had any thoughts of purchasing any of the copies. However, the bishop of London thought proper to publish A Letter to the Incumbents of all Churches and Chapels in his Diocese, concerning their not using any new Forms of Doxology, dated Dec. 26, 1718. This letter was animadverted upon by Mr. Whiston, in his Letter of thanks to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of London, for his late Letter to his Clergy against the use of new Forms of Doxology, &c. dated Jan. 17, 1718-19; and in a pamphlet, intitled, An humble Apology for St. Paul, and the other Apostles; or, a Vindication of them and their Doxologies from the Charge of Heresy. By Cornelius Paets. London 1719. Soon after came out an ironical piece, intitled, A Defence of the Bishop of London, in Answer to Mr. Whiston's Letter of Thanks, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury. To which is added, A Vindication of Dr. Sacheverell's late Endeavour to turn Mr. Whiston out of his Church. Mr. Whiston's Letter of Thanks occasioned likewise the two following pieces: viz. The Lord Bishop of London's Letter to his Clergy vindicated, &c. By a Believer; London 1719: and A seasonable Review of Mr. Whiston's Account of Primitive Doxologies, &c. By a Presbyter of the Diocese of London (*). London 1719. To the latter Mr. Whiston replied in A Second Letter to the Bishop of London, &c. dated March 11, 1718-19: and the author of the seasonable Review, &c. answered him in a Second Review, &c. As to Dr. Clarke's conduct in this affair, Mr. Whiston (48) esteems it 'one of the most Christian attempts 'towards somewhat of reformation, upon the primitive 'foot, that he ever ventured upon.' But he adds, that the Bishop of London, in the way of modern authority, was quite too hard for Dr. Clarke, in the way of primitive Christianity.

[Y] He thought proper to refuse the place of Master of the Mint.] Upon the offer of this place, he advised with his friends, and particularly with Mr. Emlyn and Mr. Whiston; who were both heartily against his accepting it, as what he did not want, as what was entirely remote from his profession; and would hinder the success of his ministry. To which Mr. Whiston added, as his principal reason against it, that such refusal would shew that he was in earnest in religion. Dr. Clarke was himself of the same opinion, and could never reconcile himself to this secular preferment. And it is taken notice of, to the honour of to Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, concerning the Proportion of Velocity and Force in Bodies in Motion (i). The beginning of the year 1729, he publiſhed at London, in 4to. the twelve firſt books of Homer's Iliad [Z]. This was the laſt year of this great and learned man's life: for he was taken ſuddenly ill the 11th of May, and died the 17th [AA]. He married Katherine, the only daughter of the Rev. Mr. Lockwood, Rector of Little Maſſingham in Norfolk; by whom he had ſeven children, two of which died before him, and one a few weeks after him (k). Since his death have been publiſhed, from his original manuſcripts, by his brother Dr. John Clarke, Dean of Sarum, An Expoſition on the Church Catechiſm [BB], and ten volumes of ſermons. The particulars of Dr. Clarke's character ſhall be laid together in the laſt remark [CC].

Mrs. Clarke, that ſhe never ſet her heart upon the advantages this place would produce to her family, but left the Doctor at full liberty to act as his conſcience and inclination ſhould direct him. Mr. Whiſton, who particularly mentions this affair, informs us (49), that Mr. Conduit, who ſucceeded, gave 1000l. to vacate a place among the King's writers; which was given to one of Dr. Clarke's ſons.

[Z] The twelve firſt books of Homer's Iliad.] This edition was printed in quarto, and dedicated to his Royal Highneſs the Duke of Cumberland. The Latin verſion is almoſt entirely new, and annotations are added at the bottom of the pages. Homer, the Biſhop of Wincheſter tells us (50), was Dr. Clarke's admired author, even to a degree of ſomething like Enthuſiaſm hardly natural to his temper; and that in this he went a little beyond the bounds of Horace's judgment, and was ſo unwilling to allow the favourite Poet ever to nod, that he has taken remarkable pains to find out, and give a reaſon for every paſſage, word, and tittle, that could create any ſuſpicion. 'The 'tranſlation, adds his Lordſhip, with his corrections, 'may now be ſtyled accurate; and his notes, as far 'as they go, are indeed a treaſury of grammatical 'and critical knowledge. He was called to this taſk 'by Royal command; and he has performed it in 'ſuch a manner, as to be worthy of the young 'Prince, for whom it was laboured. The praiſes 'given to this excellent work by the writers abroad 'in their Memoirs, as well as by the learned Maſters 'of the three principal Schools of England, thoſe of 'Weſtminſter, Eton, and St. Paul's; and the ſhort 'character, that the performance was ſupra omnem 'invidiam, beſtowed by one, whom Dr. Clarke had 'long before ſtyled, Criticos Unus omnes longe longe-'que antecellens, and whom every one will know by 'that title without my naming him; make it unne-'ceſſary to add a word upon this ſubject.' The twelve laſt books of the Iliad were publiſhed, in 1732, in 4*to* by our author's ſon, Mr. Samuel Clarke, who informs us, in the Preface, that his father had finiſhed the annotations to the three firſt of thoſe books, and as far as the 359th verſe of the fourth; and had reviſed the text and verſion as far as verſe 510 of the ſame book. A ſecond edition of the whole was publiſhed, in 1735, in two volumes 8*vo*. *

* A third edition was publiſhed in 1740.

[AA] His death.] The day on which he was taken ill (Sunday, May 11) he went out in the morning, to preach before the Judges at Serjeant's-Inn; and there was ſeized with a pain in his ſide, which made it impoſſible for him to perform the office he was called to, and became quickly ſo violent, that he was obliged to be carried home. He went to bed, and thought himſelf ſo much better in the afternoon, that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be blooded; againſt which remedy he had entertained ſtrong prejudices. But the pain returning very violently about two the next morning, made the advice and aſſiſtance of a very able Phyſician abſolutely neceſſary; who, after twice bleeding him, and other applications, thought him, as he alſo thought himſelf, to be out of all danger; and ſo continued to think, till the Saturday morning following; when, to the inexpreſſible ſurprize of all about him, the pain removed from his ſide to his head; and, after a very ſhort complaint, took away his ſenſes, ſo as they never returned any more. He continued breathing till between ſeven and eight in the evening of that day (May 17) and then died (51).

[BB] His Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm.] It is made up of thoſe Lectures he read, every Thurſday morning, for ſome months in the year, at St. James's Church. In the latter part of his time, he reviſed them with great care, and left them completely prepared for the preſs. The firſt edition of them was in 1729. This performance of Dr. Clarke's was immediately animadverted upon by a very learned Divine (*), under the title of, Remarks upon Dr. Clarke's Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm. This produced An Anſwer to the Remarks upon Dr. Clarke's Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm (‖). The author of the Remarks replied in a piece, intitled, The Nature, Obligation, and Efficacy, of the Chriſtian Sacraments, conſidered; in Reply to a Pamphlet, intitled, An Anſwer, &c. As alſo the comparative Value of Moral and Poſitive Duties diſtinctly ſtated and cleared. The Anſwerer rejoined in A Defence of the Anſwer, &c. Wherein the Difference between Moral and Poſitive Duties is fully ſtated. Being a Reply to, &c. This occaſioned A Supplement to the Treatiſe, intitled, The Nature, &c. Wherein the Nature and Value of Poſitive Inſtitutions is more particularly examined, and Objections anſwered. By the ſame author. Then followed the Anſwerer's Reply, intitled, The true Foundations of Natural and Revealed Religion aſſerted: Being a Reply to the Supplement, &c. Which being animadverted upon by the Remarker in the Poſtſcript to his Second Part of Scripture vindicated, produced An Anſwer to the Poſtſcript, &c. Wherein is ſhewn, that if Reaſon be not a ſufficient Guide in Matters of Religion, the bulk of Mankind, for four thouſand years, had no ſufficient Guide at all in Matters of Religion.

[CC] Dr. Clarke's character.] It is excellently and concifely drawn by the maſterly hand of the author (†) of Difficulties and Diſcouragements, which attend the Study of the Scripture, in the way of private Judgment; as follows (52): 'Dr. Clarke is a man, who 'has all the good qualities, that can meet together, to 'recommend him. He is poſſeſſed of all the parts of 'learning, that are valuable in a Clergyman, in a de-'gree that few poſſeſs any ſingle one. He has joined, 'to a good ſkill in the three learned languages, a great 'compaſs of the beſt Philoſophy and Mathematicks, 'as appears by his Latin works; and his Engliſh ones 'are ſuch a proof of his own piety, and of his know-'ledge in Divinity, and have done ſo much ſervice to 'religion, as would make any other man, that was 'not under the ſuſpicion of hereſy, ſecure of the 'friendſhip and eſteem of all good Churchmen, eſ-'pecially of the Clergy. And to all this piety and 'learning, and the good uſe that has been made of it, 'is added a temper happy beyond expreſſion: a ſweet, 'eaſy, modeſt, inoffenſive, obliging behaviour, adorn 'all his actions; and no paſſion, vanity, inſolence, or 'oſtentation, appear either in what he writes or ſays: 'and yet theſe faults are often incident to the beſt 'men, in the freedom of converſation, and in writing 'againſt impertinent and unreaſonable adverſaries, 'eſpecially ſuch as ſtrike at the foundations of virtue 'and religion. This is the learning, this the temper 'of the man, whoſe ſtudy of the Scriptures has betray-'ed him into a ſuſpicion of ſome heretical opinions.' After this ſhort, but comprehenſive character, and what has been already ſaid of Dr. Clarke as an author, we ſhall add only a few particulars from the accounts given us by Biſhop Hoadly and Mr. Whiſton. The former, in his character of Dr. Clarke (53), tells us; the firſt ſtrokes of knowledge, in ſome of its branches, ſeemed to be little leſs than natural to him; for they appeared to lie right in his mind, as ſoon as any thing could appear. He had one happineſs, very rarely known among the greateſt men, that his memory was almoſt equal to his judgment. He had ſo ready a genius, that he immediately comprehended what coſt others a great deal of pains, and was eſteemed one of the the beſt judges to apply to, for a quick determination about the force or failure of any arguments. His critical ſkill in the learned languages he made ſubſervient to the cauſe of religion, as well as polite learning. The deſign and tendency of his preaching was not to move the paſſions, nor had he any talent that way: but then his ſentiments and expreſſions were ſo maſterly, and his way of explaining the phraſeology of Scripture ſo extraordinary and convincing, as more than made amends for the want of the other. His converſation, which was highly uſeful and inſtructive, was attended with a readineſs of thought, and clearneſs of expreſſion, which hardly ever failed him, when his opinion was aſked upon the moſt important and trying queſtions. His piety was manly and unaffected; his charity and benevolence, extenſive as the whole rational creation; and the ruling principle of his heart and practice, a love of the religious and civil liberties of mankind. In a word, his life, when he came into the view of the great world, was an ornament and ſtrength to that religion, which his pen ſo well defended. Mr. Whiſton gives us (54) a remarkable example of what Biſhop Hoadly obſerves, that the firſt ſtrokes of knowledge ſeemed to be little leſs than natural to him. He had it from Dr. Clarke's own mouth, and it is this. One of his parents aſked him, when he was very young, whether God could do every thing? He anſwered, yes. He was aſked again, whether God could do one particular thing, could tell a lye? He anſwered, no: and he underſtood the queſtion to ſuppoſe, that this was the only thing that God could not do. Nor durſt he ſay, ſo young was he then, he thought there was any thing elſe, which God could not do: while yet he well remembered, he had even then a clear conviction in his own mind, that there was one other thing, which God could not do, viz. that he could not annihilate that ſpace, which was in the room wherein they were. Which impoſſibility now appears even in Sir Iſaac Newton's own Philoſophy. Mr. Whiſton fully agrees to the character given above of Dr. Clarke by the author of Difficulties and Diſcouragements, &c. with ſuch abatements as the Memoirs he himſelf has given us of this great man will make neceſſary. Theſe abatements, reſpecting ſome parts of the Doctor's conduct, impartiality requires us to mention. And, in the firſt place, he blames Dr. Clarke for ſubſcribing the Articles, at a time when he could not, with perfect truth and ſincerity, aſſent to the Athanaſian parts of them. This was at his taking the degree of Doctor in Divinity. Mr. Whiſton, then Profeſſor of Mathematicks at Cambridge, endeavoured to diſſuade him from it; and, when he could not prevail on that head, he earneſtly preſſed him to declare openly, and in writing, in what ſenſe he ſubſcribed the ſuſpected Articles: but he could not prevail on this head neither. Upon this occaſion, Profeſſor James, who ſuſpected Dr. Clarke of an inclination to heretical pravity, ſaid to him, upon his ſubſcribing the Articles, 'He hoped he would not 'go from his ſubſcription.' The Doctor replied, 'He could promiſe nothing as to futurity, and could 'only anſwer as to his preſent ſentiments (55).' However, Mr. Whiſton acknowledges, that Dr. Clarke, for many years before he died, perpetually refuſed all, even the greateſt preferments, which required ſubſcription, and never encouraged thoſe, who conſulted him, to ſubſcribe (56). In the next place, he objects to Dr. Clarke his not acting ſincerely, boldly, and openly, in the Declaration of his true opinions, and his over-cautious, and over-timorous way of ſpeaking, writing, and acting, in points of the higheſt conſequence. When Mr. Whiſton gave him frequent and vehement admonitions upon this head, his general anſwer, he tells us, was, who are thoſe that act better than I do? 'Very few of which (ſays he) I could 'ever name to him; though I did not think that a 'ſufficient excuſe.' Laſtly, Mr. Whiſton is greatly diſpleaſed with Dr. Clarke's conduct in relation to the affair of the Convocation. We have already ſeen (57) ſome of his reflexions upon that event, the account of which he concludes with theſe words: 'Thus 'ended this unhappy affair; unhappy to Dr. Clarke's 'own conſcience; unhappy to his beſt friends; and 'above all unhappy as to its conſequences, in relation 'to the opinion unbelievers were hereupon willing 'to entertain of him, as if he had prevaricated all 'along in his former writings for Chriſtianity.' This concluſion however, Mr. Whiſton owns, was too haſty, and that Dr. Clarke did by degrees recover part of his former character (58). We ſhall finiſh this remark, and this whole account of Dr. Clarke, with obſerving, that his great abilities and acquirements made him perpetually ſought after by all the greateſt lovers of virtue and knowledge; and that to ſuch a degree, that, through his laſt years, he could command but very little time for his own ſtudies, even in the morning: that, as he was the darling of the great and powerful, ſo, in particular, her late Majeſty Queen Caroline, from her firſt acquaintance with his character to the day of his death, expreſſed the high eſteem ſhe had of his comprehenſive capacity, and uſeful learning, by very frequent converſations with him upon the moſt important points of true Philoſophy, and real knowledge (59).  [Not many particulars of importance, with regard to the perſonal hiſtory of Dr. Clarke, have been brought to light, ſince our learned predeceſſor's article was written. Mr. Whiſton, in his own life, often mentions the Doctor; but hath ſcarcely related any thing concerning him which had not before occurred in the hiſtorical memoirs. The principal circumſtance we have met with, is Mr. Whiſton's aſſertion, that Dr. Clarke greatly approved of his moſt important diſcovery, that the infants and little children, who, in the firſt and ſecond centuries, were made partakers of baptiſm, were ſuch only as were arrived to years capable of catechetic inſtruction, though they might not be fit for underſtanding harder matters (60).

Some anecdotes concerning our great Divine have lately been printed in the Gentleman's Magazine. They were collected by the Rev. Mr. Jones, of Welwyn, and are not wholly incurious. We learn from them, that Dr. Clarke was of a very humane and tender diſpoſition. When his young children amuſed themſelves with tormenting and killing flies upon the windows, he not only forbad ſuch practices, but calmly reaſoned with them, in ſuch a familiar manner, as was calculated to make a powerful impreſſion upon their minds. He was very ready and condeſcending in anſwering applications to him with reſpect to ſcruples; numberleſs inſtances of which occurred in the courſe of his life.

One thing of which Dr. Clarke was peculiarly cautious, was not to loſe the leaſt minute of his time. He always carried ſome book about him, which he would read whilſt riding in a coach, or walking in the fields, or if he had any leiſure moments free from company or his other ſtudies. Nay, he would read even in company itſelf, where he might take ſuch a liberty without offence to good manners. This example of literary diligence we cannot but regard as highly worthy of imitation; ſince it is ſurprizing to conſider, what good effects would ariſe from a ſedulous improvement of thoſe ſmall intervals of time which numbers of perſons caſt away as of no conſequence.

When our author was a young ſtudent at the Univerſity, he was ſo diſtinguiſhed by the excellence of his exerciſes, and by other marks of unuſual proficiency in literature, that he was commonly ſpoken of, among the reſt of the ſcholars, by the title of "The lad of Caius." His public exerciſe, of which an account is given in note [P], was long remembered in the Univerſity, and by the learned men of that period. Dr. Henry Yarborough, Prebendary of York, and Rector of Tewing, Herts, declared, that he never heard any act equal to it or like it. The ſame gentleman, when at the age of ſeventy-ſeven, ſaid, that he would gladly take a ride to Cambridge, to hear ſuch another act as had been kept by Dr. Clarke.

Dr. Clarke's memory was remarkably ſtrong. He told Mr. Pyle, of Lynn, that he never forgot any thing which he had once thoroughly apprehended and underſtood. The Doctor, with his intimate friends, was perfectly free and eaſy; but if ſtrangers were introduced, he behaved with much circumſpection, converſing only upon common topics. When he viſited Dr. Sykes, his uſual way was to ſit with him upon a couch, and, reclining upon his boſom, to diſcourſe with him, in the moſt familiar manner, upon ſuch ſubjects as were agreeable to the taſte and judgment of both.

When Sir John Germaine lay upon his death-bed, and was in great confuſion and trouble of mind, he ſent for Dr. Clarke, and requeſted to know of him whether he ſhould receive the Sacrament, and what he ſhould do in his ſad condition. The Doctor, who was well acquainted with Sir John's purſuits and courſe of life, ſedately replied, that he could not adviſe him to receive the Sacrament, and that he did not think it likely to be of any avail to him with reſpect to his final welfare. Having ſaid this, he departed without adminiſtering the Communion, having firſt recommended the dying man to the mercy of God.

An ingenious, learned, and worthy Clergyman, coming out of the country, went one Sunday to hear Dr. Clarke; and was ſo delighted with his diſcourſe, that he declared, he would at any time go twenty miles to partake of the ſame ſatisfaction.

Mr. Pope has a kind of reflection upon Dr. Clarke's frequenting the Court; to which the Poet was ſtimulated by reſentment againſt the Doctor, becauſe he refuſed to uſe his intereſt for obtaining the recall of Lord Bolingbroke from France, with a general pardon.

Theſe are the principal anecdotes which Mr. Jones had met with; and for moſt of them he mentions his authorities (61).

(61) Gent. Magazine, for March, 1783, p. 227—229. vol. liii.

In the article of Mr. Thomas Bott, we have related an inſtance of Dr. Clarke's chearful, and even playful diſpoſition (62). This turn of his mind hath ſince been confirmed by Dr. Warton, who, in his obſervations on the following line of Mr. Pope, (62) Biog. Brit. vol. ii. p. 428.

"Unthought of frailties cheat us in the wiſe," ſays, "Who could imagine that LOCKE was fond of "romances; that NEWTON once ſtudied aſtrology; "that Dr. CLARKE valued himſelf for his agility, "and frequently amuſed himſelf, in a private room "of his houſe, in leaping over the tables and chairs: "and that our author himſelf was a great epi-"cure (63)?" With reſpect to what is here recorded of Dr. Clarke, we can ſcarcely perſuade ourſelves to conſider it as a frailty. To be poſſeſſed of ſuch a temper as his was, muſt have been no ſmall degree of happineſs; as it probably enabled him to purſue his important and ſerious ſtudies with greater vivacity and vigour. To be capable of deriving amuſement from trivial circumſtances, indicates a heart at eaſe, and may generally be regarded as the concomicant of virtue.*

(63) Warton on the Writings and Genius of Pope, vol. ii. p. 186.

* Dr. Clarke amuſed himſelf at times with a game at cards. Anecdotes of Bowyer, p. 22.

There is another thing relative to Dr. Clarke, introduced by Dr. Warton, which requires a particular diſcuſſion. It is conveyed in a quotation from Chevalier Ramſay, which Dr. Warton has not tranſlated. The paſſage is as follows: "M. le Chevalier New-"ton, grand Géométre & nullement Métaphyſicien, "étoit perſuadé de la vérité de la religion: mais il "voulut raſiner ſur d'ancienne Orientales, & renou-"vella l'Arianiſme par l'organe de ſon fameux diſ-"ciple & interprete M. Clarke; qui m'avoua quel-"que tems avans que de mourir après pluſieurs con-"férences que j'avois eues avec lui, combien il ſe "repentoit d'avoir fait imprimer ſon ouvrage: je "fus témoin il y a douze ans, à Londres, de der-"niers ſentimens de ce modeſte & verteux Docteur "(64)." Of this remarkable paſſage, Mr. Lindſey, who hath made ſome ſtrictures upon it, hath given the ſubſequent tranſlation. "Sir Iſaac Newton, a "profound Mathematician, but no Metaphyſician "at all, was a ſincere believer in chriſtianity; but "being carried away with a fondneſs to refine upon "the ancient hereſies of the Eaſt, he revived Aria-"niſm by the pen of his famous diſciple and inter-"preter Dr. Clarke; who owned to me, ſome little "time before his death, after ſeveral conferences that "I had with him, that he greatly repented that he "ever publiſhed his work (on the Trinity.) I was "witneſs twelve years ago, that theſe were the laſt "ſentiments of this modeſt and virtuous Divine."

(64) Ibid. p. 180.

Dr. Warton obſerves, that perhaps ſome may be almoſt ready to doubt the truth of the fact related by Mr. Ramſay (65). For our part, we are not only almoſt ready to doubt the truth of it, but have no heſitation in declaring, that we believe it to be an abſolute falſehood. A narration of ſo extraordinary a nature could not have eſcaped our attention, if it had hitherto paſſed unnoticed: but as it has lately been fully conſidered by Mr. Lindſey, in the preface to his "Hiſtorical View of the State of the Unitarian Doc-"trine and Worſhip," we ſhall have little more to do than to repeat that worthy and learned gentleman's obſervations. Firſt, Mr. Emlyn, than whom ſcarcely any one had more of Dr. Clarke's confidence on religious ſubjects, furniſhes a proof within a very ſhort time of the Doctor's death, of his not having changed his ſentiments concerning the Trinity, which he had before publiſhed. "He once ſhewed me, ſays "Mr. Emlyn, that he had been making ſome emen-"dations in his Common-Prayer book; and the very "laſt time, I think, I ever ſaw him, (the March be-"fore he died) and in ſome of our laſt diſcourſe at "parting, he aſked me, if he had ſhewn me what he "had been doing in his Common-Prayer. I ſaid I "had juſt ſeen it once: he added, that it ſhould not "be loſt. With what deſign or view he had done it, "he never ſaid to me. —— But I hardly ſuppoſe he "ever finiſhed the work, being ſo ſoon after taken "away from us. A few days before his ſickneſs in "May 1729, I received a letter from him about a "private affair; but before I could anſwer it, I "heard firſt that he was ſick, and quickly after that "he was dead; and thus to my great grief a ſudden "end was put to our friendly converſe, and all his "intercourſe with this earth cut off." Now it is well known that Dr. Clarke's amendments in the common-prayer book, his approbation of which was thus apparent ſo ſhort a time before his deceaſe, contain the moſt deciſive proofs that he had not retracted his former opinions concerning the Trinity. Secondly, Biſhop Hoadly gives ſuch a deſcription of Dr. Clarke's laſt illneſs, as leaves no room to ſuppoſe that Mr. Ramſay could be admitted to his bed-ſide, to have any converſation with him. For the account of his ſickneſs, ſee note [AA]. Thirdly, the falſity of Ramſay's ſtory may abſolutely be determined from the poſitive aſſurances of the great prelate juſt mentioned, who informs us, (in a paſſage already quoted in note [S]) that Dr. Clarke, from the time of his publiſhing his "Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," to the day of his death, found no reaſon to alter the notions which he had there profeſſed, concerning the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. The Biſhop adds, that he thought proper juſt to mention this, as what all the Doctor's friends knew to be the truth (66).

(65) Ibid.

(66) Hiſtorical View. Preface, p. xii—xix.

The juſtice of theſe remarks is deciſively confirmed by the teſtimony of Dr. Clarke's own ſon. An idle report, of a ſimilar nature to that of Mr. Ramſay's, having been propagated in a news-paper ſeveral years ago, the following anſwer to it was publiſhed in the ſame paper.

"Extract from the London Evening Poſt, printed "Saturday, December 7, 1771."

"To the Printer of the London Evening Poſt.

"Sir,

"You are deſired to inſert in your paper the fol-"lowing article, and you will oblige

"Your humble ſervant,

"Saliſbury, Nov. 30, 1771. "Samuel Clarke.

"Whereas in the London Evening Poſt, on or "about the 25th of May, 1771, there appeared an "anonymous paragraph, highly reflecting on the "late Dr. Samuel Clarke, Rector of St. James's "Weſtminſter; wherein it is aſſerted, that Dr. Clarke "certainly gave up his principles a long time before he "died; and that Mr. Jackſon, Miniſter of Torring-"ton, ſaid he had it from Dr. Clarke's ſon, that the "Doctor on his death-bed ſaid; Nothing grieved him "ſo much as writing his book on the Trinity, and wiſhed "he could ſee all his books on that ſubject burning be-"fore him."

"Mr. Clarke, in juſtice to his father's memory, "and alſo to prevent the public from being impoſed "upon by ſuch a falſehood, thinks himſelf obliged to "declare,

" declare, that Mr. Jackſon is a perſon entirely un" known to him, and one whom he cannot recollect
" ever to have been in company with; nor could he
" poſſibly ſay to any perſon what is here affirmed, as " he has not the leaſt reaſon to believe that his father
" ever retracted any of his ſentiments."

" The falſehood of the aſſertion appears evident
" from this circumſtance; that Dr. Clarke, a little " before his death, reviſed his work, intitled, " The " Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity" deſignedly for " a third edition; and inſerted in the preface an ad" ditional paragraph, relating particularly to that
" edition, which was after his death publiſhed ac" cordingly, in the year 1732 (67)."

(67) Lindſey's Apology, p. 86—88. Fourth edition.

Mr. Martin Madan, with that ſhameful bigotry and diſingenuity by which his writings in general are marked, republiſhed the injurious paragraph of the London Evening Poſt, in the preface to his " Scriptural Comment on the thirty-nine Articles of " the Church of England," without taking the leaſt notice of its having been publickly contradicted and refuted (68).

(68) Ibid.

With regard to Mr. Ramſay's anecdote concerning Dr. Clarke, to which Dr. Warton, from not knowing, or not recollecting, the facts above-mentioned, appears to have given too eaſy a credit, it may be thought difficult to account for the poſitive terms in which it is related. The queſtion is ſolved by Mr. Lindſey in the following manner. " We have no" thing, ſays he, therefore to conclude, but that this " tale of Dr. Clarke's reconverſion to the orthodox " opinion concerning the Trinity,—and which is in-" ſinuated by the author of it as having been brought " about in a good meaſure by his conferences with
" the Doctor, and the ſecret of which he entruſted to " him alone when near his end, is nothing but an " anecdote of Mr. Ramſay's own invention, con" trived to ingratiate and make himſelf of conſe-
" quence with his new popiſh friends on the other
" ſide of the water, to whoſe religion he had become " a convert. And it is one humiliating circum-
" ſtance, among others, that high myſtic pietiſts are " wont to be above paying a ſtrict regard to truth,
" when ſome good end, as they imagine, may be
" ſerved by their deviating from it (69)."

(69) Preface to Lindſey's Hiſtorical View, ubi ſupra, p. xix, xx.

Though we feel the truth and force of Mr. Lindſey's laſt obſervation, and are no ſtrangers to the pious frauds which bigots and enthuſiaſts in all ages have thought themſelves juſtified in adopting, we are deſirous, if poſſible, of letting Mr. Ramſay off upon eaſier terms. As, notwithſtanding his abſurdities and whims, eminently conſpicuous in his later writings, we have always conſidered him as not only a man of ingenuity, but of a reſpectable moral character, we are willing to ſuppoſe that he miſtook ſome expreſſion in his converſation with Dr. Clarke; and that this miſtake, operating on a ſanguine diſpoſition and a warm imagination, ripened, in a courſe of years, into the aſſertion he has made, without his abſolutely intending to deliver a falſehood. But to whatever cauſes it was owing, that he has advanced a falſehood is a clear matter of fact. It muſt, therefore, now be regarded as a decided point, that Dr. Clarke never retracted his opinion concerning the Trinity; ſo that if any reports of a ſimilar nature with thoſe we have already confuted ſhould again happen to be ſpread abroad, they are at once to be rejected as totally groundleſs.

The writings of our great Divine are ſo various, ſo excellent in themſelves, and upon ſubjects of ſuch peculiar conſequence, that they have perpetually been referred to by ſucceeding authors, and have been an unceaſing fund of remark and diſcuſſion. Hence it would be impoſſible to take notice of all the references that have been made to them; and it would carry us too far out of our way, to ſpecify all the inſtances of this kind which have fallen within our own obſervation. Nevertheleſs, there are ſome things that cannot wholly be omitted; and eſpecially ſuch as tend to throw light on our literary hiſtory, and on the revolutions to which the opinions of men, even on topics of importance, are ſubject. In the obſervations we ſhall make, it will be moſt expedient to follow the order of time in which ſuch works of Dr. Clarke as we ſhall have occaſion to mention were publiſhed.

It is ſaid, in note [C], that to this day the Doctor's tranſlation of Rohault is, generally ſpeaking, the ſtanding text for lectures in the Univerſity of Cambridge; and his notes the firſt direction to thoſe who are willing to receive the reality and truth of things, in the place of invention and romance. But though ſuch an aſſertion might be true when our predeceſſor's article was originally printed, or rather when Biſhop Hoadly's account of Dr. Clarke was written, the caſe, we apprehend, muſt now be very different. As Sir Iſaac Newton's philoſophy hath completely triumphed over that of Deſcartes, Rohault can no longer be a text book for Tutors. Dr. Rutherforth publiſhed a work for the uſe of his own pupils, which might be adopted by other gentlemen; and Rowning's " Introduction" has been much uſed in ſeminaries of education. As improvements continue to be made in natural knowledge, new authors will be fixed upon by judicious profeſſors, and Rowning will probably be ſuperſeded by Nicholſon.

One of Dr. Clarke's early performances was his Paraphraſe on the four Goſpels, which has always been held in general eſtimation. Lately ſome ſtrictures have been made upon it by an ingenious writer, Dr. Campbell, in his Philoſophy of Rhetoric (70). His remarks, however, are not intended to depretiate Dr. Clarke's performance in compariſon with other productions of a like nature; but to ſhew, that it is the common fault of a paraphraſe to act like a torpedo; ſo that, by its influence, the moſt vivid ſentiments become lifeleſs, the moſt ſublime are flattened, the moſt fervent chilled, the moſt vigourous enervated. We are much of the ſame opinion with Dr. Campbell. It is undeniable, that paraphraſts too often miſtake the very end they aim at; and that by thinking themſelves obliged to uſe, on every occaſion, a certain uniform portion and diffuſeneſs of language, they weaken what is equally clear, and more forcible and beautiful, as ſimply expreſſed in the original. It is ridiculous to extend, by an accumulation of words, thoſe parts of ſacred writ which in themſelves have a plain and obvious meaning. The places that are ſo perſpicuous as neither to require or admit of any elucidation, ſhould be left untouched; and thoſe paſſages only ſhould be drawn out which, by being too obſcure and figurative for vulgar apprehenſion, may ſtand in need of enlargement. The method purſued by Biſhop Pearce in his Commentary is the moſt eligible that can be choſen, as he never ſubjoins an explanation when the text itſelf is ſo clear that it cannot well be miſtaken. However, of the paraphraſes that exiſt, Dr. Clarke's is one of the leaſt exceptionable; and, notwithſtanding Dr. Campbell's ſtrictures, it has been, and will continue to be, in many reſpects, of conſiderable utility. Dr. Campbell, if it had not been his intention to ſhew that the moſt judicious paraphraſts are defective, might eaſily have pointed out other writers who are far more blameable. Dr. Clarke's work is conciſe, terſe, and energetic, compared with thoſe of many perſons whom we could mention. The worſt author of this kind we have ever met with, is a Mr. Holden, ſome time ſince a Diſſenting Miniſter at Malden in Eſſex. This gentleman, though he was a man of underſtanding, of liberal principles, and not deſtitute of learning, has been ſo unfortunate, in paraphraſes which he publiſhed on ſeveral parts of the Old Teſtament, extending from the beginning of Job to the end of Iſaiah, as not only to weaken the original by a multiplicity of words, but even to render it remarkably obſcure. In a thouſand caſes, it would be impoſſible to tell, by reading Mr. Holden's paraphraſe alone, what was the verſe which he intended to explain.

(70) Philoſophy of Rhetoric, vol. ii. p. 297—302.

Dr. Clarke's Treatiſe on the Being and Attributes of God, and on the Evidences of natural and revealed Religion, is a production of great importance in the annals of Engliſh literature. It is of great importance on account of its intrinſic excellence, the receptions it hath met with, the influence it hath had on the opinions of men, and the ſtrictures, remarks, and diſquiſitions to which it has given occaſion. With regard to the argument à priori, there is not much to be added to what is ſaid upon the ſubject in note [I]. Undoubtedly the grand, the proper, the deciſive proof of the exiſtence, perfections, and providence of the Deity muſt be drawn from his works. On this proof, proof, as being equally ſatisfactory to the profoundeſt Philoſopher and the meaneſt Peaſant, the cauſe of religion will ever ſtand ſecure. Nevertheleſs, if there be ſuch a thing as an argument à priori, why may not ſpeculative men be employed in its examination? Several able Divines and Philoſophers have thought, and ſtill think, that this argument for the being and attributes of God, will ſtand the teſt of the ſevereſt ſcrutiny; and, therefore, they cannot be blamed for endeavouring to ſet it in a convincing light to others. Mr. Moſes Lowman, a learned Diſſenting Clergyman, wrote a ſhort tract upon the ſubject, which Dr. Samuel Chandler, in his funeral Sermon for that gentleman, pronounced to be an abſolute demonſtration. It is a curious pamphlet, which the writer of the preſent note has read again and again with much ſatisfaction; though he apprehends, that there is one place wherein the chain of the reaſoning is ſomewhat interrupted. The late Mr. Andrew Baxter could not bear to have the argument à priori treated with contempt. Having ſeen an advertiſement, in a news-paper, of a certain author who meant to write againſt that argument, he ſaid in French with much vehemence, "C'eſt un Sot (71)." Some language which, perhaps, was indiſcreetly uſed by Dr. Clarke in his Demonſtration, was perverted by Mr. Hume, in his firſt work, the "Treatiſe on hu-" man Nature," to atheiſtical purpoſes. As this work is now become ſcarce, and is not at hand, it is not in our power to refer to particular paſſages; but we believe that we are not miſtaken in the fact. We ſpeak, likewiſe, from memory, when we ſay that Dr Clarke had read and availed himſelf of Howe's "Living Temple," though we do not recollect that he ever made ſuch an acknowledgment.

(71) From a learned correſpondent.

That part of our eminent Divine's "Evidences" which related to the nature and obligations of virtue, introduced a kind of new language into our ethical writings. Not that the ſentiments themſelves were new. The eſſential diſtinction between virtue and vice, had been well underſtood and expreſſed in every age of the world, and had been amply inſiſted upon both by ancients and moderns. Dr. Cudworth had written, not long before, upon immutable morality. Dr. Clarke, in delineating this immutable morality, having founded it upon the eternal differences, relations, and fitneſſes of things, and having made continual uſe of theſe terms, the ſame terms were adopted by a number of authors, and even became faſhionable in Sermons, where a more natural and popular ſtyle would have been preferable. The Doctor's ſyſtem was not univerſally admitted, various publications appearing on the other ſide of the queſtion. Some contended, that the ſole obligation of virtue aroſe from the will of God; an opinion which Warburton afterwards embraced and ſupported in his "Divine Legation of Moſes." A controverſy upon the ſame ſubject was carried on between two Preſbyterian Miniſters, Dr. Wright and Mr. Mole; the former of whom oppoſed Dr. Clarke's ſcheme, whilſt the latter defended it with a ſtrength of reaſon far ſuperior to that of his antagoniſt. Mrs. Cockburn had equally the advantage in her Remarks upon the principles and reaſonings of Dr. Rutherforth's Eſſay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue.

But what made the greateſt inroad upon Dr. Clarke's ethical Syſtem, was the ſentimental one, which had been introduced by Lord Shafteſbury, but did not come much into vogue, till Profeſſor Hutcheſon had publiſhed his Enquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, and his Treatiſe on the Paſſions. From that time the philoſophy of diſtinct moral inſtincts became very prevalent, and was ably ſupported by a number of eminent Scotch writers. Of late it ſeems to be upon the decline, and Hartley's Principle of Aſſociation hath gained a conſiderable number of followers: but we ſay the leſs on this matter at preſent, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly upon it in future articles. Whilſt the diſpute concerning the nature, foundation, and obligations of virtue was carried on, an ingenious treatiſe was publiſhed, by Mr. Jameſon, a Clergyman of Scotland, with a view of reconciling the different ſchemes which had been advanced upon the ſubject. The author contended, with no ſmall force of reaſoning, that virtue was alike founded on the eternal relations and fitneſſes of things, on moral inſtincts, and on the will of God. We remember having read the work, many years ago, with great pleaſure. The beſt book in defence of Dr. Clarke's Syſtem is Dr. Price's Principles of Morals. This is, indeed, a moſt capital performance, which goes to the bottom of the matter, and which ought to be read by all who would fully be maſters of the controverſy, whether they do or do not coincide in ſentiment with the worthy writer.

Among the perſons who have made ſtrictures on Dr. Clarke's works, there is no one who hath done it with greater malignity than Lord Bolingbroke. This noble author, in his zeal for deſtroying the moral attributes of God, hath poured upon the Doctor the moſt plentiful abuſe. He hath repeatedly charged him with arrogance and inſolence, though no man was ever more mild and modeſt in his temper, more calm, gentle, and unaſſuming in his reaſonings. For this ſhameful treatment of ſo excellent a writer, Lord Bolingbroke received ample caſtigation from the hand of Biſhop Warburton, in his View of that nobleman's philoſophy. Mrs. Macaulay Graham hath, likewiſe, very recently appeared as an advocate for Dr. Clarke, in oppoſition to the ſame antagoniſt, in her Eſſay on the Immutability of moral Truth. Dr. Prieſtley, in his Letters to a philoſophical Unbeliever, hath, alſo, paid conſiderable attention to our great Divine's Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God. As to the merit of the whole work, including the Evidences of natural and revealed Religion, it is undoubtedly of the firſt order. Difficulties may be raiſed on particular points, and the ableſt and moſt candid enquirers may ſometimes ſee cauſe to heſitate with regard to the validity of the reaſoning; but ſtill, in general, the book reflects honour on the age as well as the author that produced it, and will deſcend, with diſtinguiſhed reputation, to a late poſterity. The defence, in particular, of the ſacred original and authority of Chriſtianity is admirably conducted. In this part of the work, Dr. Clarke is underſtood to have been under ſome obligations to Mr. Baxter's Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion. The treatiſe of that eminent Nonconformiſt, he is ſaid to have conſidered as one of the moſt maſterly performances on the ſubject of any in the Engliſh language; and Mr. Jones informs us, in the anecdotes before referred to, that he made ſuch a declaration to Dr. Doddridge (72). With reſpect to the latter fact, we have no doubt but that Mr. Jones was miſtaken; being well aſſured, that Dr. Doddridge had never any perſonal acquaintance with Dr. Clarke.

(72) Gent. Mag. vol. liii. p. 228.

The Doctor's Letter to Mr. Dodwell was upon a ſubject that hath frequently been diſcuſſed. The generality of Divines, till of late years, aſſerted the immateriality and natural immortality of the ſoul; and to have embraced a contrary opinion, would have been regarded as a matter of dangerous conſequence. But things have ſince taken another turn; and the univerſal ſatisfaction which Biſhop Hoadly repreſents his friend to have given, by the letter to Mr. Dodwell, would not have appeared in the preſent ſtate of religious ſentiments. The doctrine that the ſoul doth not exiſt ſeparately from the body, has not only been advanced by ſceptical philoſophers, but hath been adopted of late by men of the moſt ardent zeal for religion, and who have the ſtrongeſt ſolicitude for the honour of the Chriſtian Revelation. We appeal for the truth of our aſſertion to ſuch names as Taylor of Norwich, Peckard, Blackbourne, and Law. We need not ſay how much Dr. Prieſtley has diſtinguiſhed himſelf in favour of materialiſm, in his diſquiſitions concerning matter and ſpirit; and all his friends know, that there cannot be a more ſincere believer in the Goſpel, or one who is more earneſtly concerned for what he apprehends to be its genuine excellence and glory. This is a juſtice which ought ever to be done to his character, even by thoſe who may differ the moſt from him in opinion. We do not ſpeak thus as advocates for all the principles he hath lately advanced, but as pleading for the exerciſe of candour and liberality, amidſt the diſcordant ſentiments to which the wiſeſt and beſt of mankind are ſubject. It is both amuſing and inſtructive, to take a ſurvey of the revolutions of philoſophical and theological ſyſtems; and it is, at the ſame time, a great ſatisfaction tisfaction to consider, that these revolutions cannot affect the grand foundations of religion. The moral arguments for a future state do not depend upon the question whether the soul be composed of matter or spirit, or whether it doth or doth not exist separately from the body. To this it must be added, that the doctrine of eternal life is not grounded upon any precarious reasonings. It stands on the solid basis of Christianity; being supported by the infallible evidence of the miracles of our Lord in general, and above all, by his resurrection from the dead.

Dr. Clarke's noble edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, which Mr. Addison has so justly commended, has risen in value from that time to the present. A copy of this edition in large paper, most splendidly bound in Morocco, was sold at the Hon. Mr. Beauclerk's sale for forty-four pounds; and it was said to be purchased by the Duke of Grafton. "To a prince "or a nobleman, says Dr. Harwood, it was a cheap "purchase; for it was the most magnificent book I "ever beheld. The binding cost Mr. Beauclerk five "guineas (73)."

(73) Harwood's View of the various Editions of the Greek and Roman Classics, p. 185. Third edition.

We shall not enter into the progress of the controversy occasioned by Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, as it would carry us into too large a compass, and as the subject must again be resumed in future articles. Nothing could be fairer, or better calculated to bring the question to a proper issue, than laying before the reader, in so distinct and orderly a manner, all the passages of the New Testament that have any relation to the point in dispute. If it should be thought that the Doctor's concessions to the upper house of convocation were somewhat greater than he ought to have submitted to, it may be observed in his favour, that he made ample amends by his subsequent conduct. We know, and indeed it is taken notice of in note [CC], that he would not renew his subscription for any preferment; and the able and learned author of the Confessional hath lately produced a proof of Dr. Clarke's sentiments on this head. In his manuscript corrections of the liturgy, when he comes to the articles, he has inserted the following query — "Would it not be of service to religion, if all clergymen, instead of subscribing to the thirty-nine "articles, were required to subscribe only to the "matters contained in the questions put by the "Bishop (in the office for obtaining priests) to every "person to be obtained priest (74)?"

(74) Confessional, p. 426. note. Third edition.

Though in the papers which passed between Dr. Clarke and Mr. Leibnitz, the Doctor distinguished himself as a most acute metaphysician, and was generally esteemed to have greatly the advantage in his vindication of the freedom of the human will, he was not so happy as to put an end to the dispute. Many able men and sagacious reasoners still continue to entertain a different opinion. Indeed, the controversy concerning liberty and necessity has been renewed from age to age, and will never be ended. It was discussed by the ancient Philosophers, and not forgotten by the ancient Fathers. It was carried on by the Schoolmen with all the subtilty and variety of distinctions for which they were so eminently conspicuous. At the time of the Reformation, Erasmus and Luther engaged in it; and it was resumed by a multitude of writers in almost every country of Europe. In our own kingdom, during the last century, the matter seemed to be examined to the bottom by Hobbes and Bramhall. This, however, has not prevented the controversy from being revived, again and again, in the present century. No one can be a stranger to the very recent discussion of it by Dr. Priestley, Dr. Price, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Bryant, Dr. Dawson, and other ingenious men. It is not easy to advance any thing new upon so beaten a subject; and, notwithstanding all the acuteness which metaphysicians have displayed upon it, it is still attended with insuperable difficulties. Sanguine Philosophers on both sides, may imagine, that there is demonstration in favour of their own opinion: but it is not likely that demonstration can exist upon points, concerning which the wisest persons have differed in every period of the world. In short, the question of liberty and necessity, will for ever continue to humble the pride of the reasoning faculties of man.

The original copy of Dr. Clarke's corrected Liturgy is now lodged in the British Museum, having been deposited there by his son. The alterations with respect to the object of worship are numerous and important, as may be seen in the account which Mr. Lindsey has given of them, in the last edition of his Apology (75).

(75) Apology, p. 199—207. Fourth edition.

Greater notice ought to have been taken by our learned predecessor, of Dr. Clarke's sermons, because they sustain a distinguished rank in that species of composition. Few discourses in the English language are more judicious, and fewer still are equally instructive. The reasoning and the practical parts are excellent, and the explanations of scripture are uncommonly valuable. Though Dr. Clarke had not the turn of mind which qualified him for moving the passions, and, indeed, did not make it his object, his sentiments, nevertheless, are frequently expressed with such a clearness of conception and such a force of language, as to produce in well disposed readers all the effect of the pathetic. Several volumes of sermons have been published since his time, which are far superior in point of elegance and beauty, and we have the highest sense of their merit. But still, if we were called upon to recommend discourses which abound with the most solid instruction, and promise the most lasting improvement, we should never forget a Clarke and a Jortin.

Mr. Knox's opinion of Dr. Clarke's Sermons is not very different from our own. "The sagacious "Clarke, says he, pretended not to wit. He af-"fected not the ambitious ornaments of rhetoric. "He rarely reaches the sublime, or aims at the pa-"thetic; but in a clear, manly, flowing style, he "delivers the most important doctrines, confirmed "on every occasion by well applied passages of "scripture. If he was not a shining orator, accord-"ing to the ideas of rhetoricians, he was a very "agreeable as well as useful preacher (76)." What Mr. Knox has added concerning Dr. Clarke's not being perfectly orthodox, and in disparagement of speculative and polemical divinity, we do not consider as equally judicious. The study of speculative and polemical divinity is proper in its place, and, indeed, is of eminent utility in ascertaining the real doctrines of scripture. The Doctor's labours in this respect are deemed highly valuable by very able judges. There is no one who hath entered so fully into the character of our author's sermons as Dr. Weales, in his "Christian Orator delineated;" and, therefore, we shall transcribe what he hath advanced upon the subject.

(76) Knox's Essays, vol. ii. p. 340. Edition of 1782.

"If you would behold the native light of truth "obscured by no cloudy or ambiguous phrases, no "false or distorted sentiments, no corrupt passions or "acquired prejudices, peruse the inestimable sermons "of CLARKE and CONEYBEARE. The chief merit "of these two celebrated preachers lies in that scho-"lastic precision and philosophic closeness, with "which each special article of faith or morals is "treated. Few or no sallies of fancy are commit-"ted, which arise from the mind's collecting all its "powers to view only one side of a subject, while it "leaves the other unobserved. All florid epithets, "all frigid circumlocutions, which only tend to "weaken or debase an argument, are utterly rejected. "Each finished discourse forms a whole, coherent "and proportioned in itself, with due subordinacy "of constituent parts. If it turns upon a branch of "morality, or any particular virtue, they never fail "to state the limits, extent and compass of it, with a "wonderful justness and propriety. If it rests upon "any article of faith, they ever comprize the doctri-"nal part in such a space, as to leave sufficient room "for a distinct and particular enforcement of the "practical duties resulting from it.

"With what logical accuracy, and that suited to "the level or reach of the most ordinary hearer, "does a CLARKE place it beyond the shadow of a "doubt, that man's truest wisdom consists in the "practice of virtue. Behold a beautiful chain of "inductions, consequences, and demonstrations, "formed altogether by common sense." 'If, says 'he, wisdom consists in studying those things which 'are of the greatest use and necessity for us to know; 'if it be wise to employ our thoughts about things 'in their own nature the most excellent, and in their 'relation to us of the utmost importance; if it be 'wise

'wiſe to purſue the nobleſt ends, and in the purſuit 'thereof to uſe the beſt and propereſt means; if it be 'wiſe to conſult our own real happineſs, and to be 'more concerned for the improvement of our minds 'in practical knowledge, than for amuſing them with 'vain and empty ſpeculations; if eternity be of more 'importance than time, and a never-ceaſing duration 'than a tranſitory moment; if the favour of God 'be infinitely more valuable than the friendſhip of 'the world; if joy and ſatisfaction of mind be truly 'more deſirable than an endleſs anxiety, horror and 'deſpair; if peace, love, and charity, and univerſal 'good-will be more eligible than wars, confuſions, 'and deſolations; in a word, if wiſdom conſiſts in 'knowing and diſtinguiſhing, in chuſing and adher-'ing to whatever things are true, honeſt, juſt, pure, 'lovely, of good report, things that promote the 'health of our bodies and ſecure the peace of our 'ſouls, things that eſtabliſh the order of the world, 'and make other men happy as well as ourſelves, 'things that make our preſent enjoyments eaſy, and 'the remembrance of what is paſt comfortable, and 'the hopes and expectations of what is to come ſe-'cure; if the chuſing theſe things be the part of a 'wiſe man, then is religion evidently man's trueſt 'wiſdom.'

"How naturally do perſuaſion, as well as con-"viction, wait upon each member which this excel-"lent paragraph is made up of! How agreeably are "the minds of an audience kept in ſuſpenſe from "one end of it to the other, even till it cloſes to "their full ſatisfaction and perfect aſſent! In what a "ſtrong light is a doctrine placed by ſuch a diſtinct "enumeration of particulars! How much does the "force as well as grace of arguments or inſtructions "depend on their conciſeneſs!

"With what marvellous force and beauty hath he "made particular mention of the ſeveral perfections "which conſtitute the divine nature or eſſence, and "thereby rendered our idea of God infinitely more "auguſt, more ſenſible, more touching." 'The 'knowledge of God, ſays he, muſt not be a bare 'ſpeculation, but a ſerious, practical, affecting im-'preſſion, and a deep ſenſe upon the mind of a 'Supreme Being, whoſe glory no eye can behold, 'whoſe majeſty no thought can comprehend, whoſe 'power no ſtrength can reſiſt, from whoſe preſence 'no ſwiftneſs can flee, from whoſe knowledge no 'ſecret can be concealed, whoſe juſtice no art can 'evade, whoſe goodneſs every creature partakes of.'

"No writer is ſuperior to him in an accuracy of "diſtinction upon the moſt difficult and perplexed "topics. Of this ſort is the following one, among "a number of the like intereſting nature." 'Things, ſays he, contrary to that part even of the 'law of nature itſelf, which is founded originally in 'the will of God, and not in the neceſſary and eſſen-'tial nature of things, may be done upon particular 'and extraordinary occaſions by the immediate and 'expreſs command of God. But that part of the law 'of nature, which is not founded on the will, but on 'the very exiſtence of God, and the eſſentially and 'eternally immutable nature and relations of things; 'this is in no circumſtances capable of any variation: 'For inſtance, that the life of an innocent perſon 'ſhould be taken away by the authority of any 'power upon earth, is contrary to the law of nature. 'Nevertheleſs, ſince the right which even an innocent 'perſon has to his life, is not founded in the eſſential 'nature of things, but merely in the will and free 'gift of God, it is plain he may as juſtly appoint it 'to be taken away by any other means he pleaſes, as 'by a fever or peſtilence. Had God commanded 'Abraham to hate his blameleſs ſon, the command 'had been in its own nature impoſſible and abſurd.'

"No preacher is equal to him for a ſimilar ac-"quaintance with, and clear expoſition of ſcripture "language.  [CLARKE (WILLIAM), a learned Divine and Antiquary, was born at Haghmon Abbey, in Shropſhire, in the year 1696. His grammatical education he received at Shrewſbury ſchool, at that time under the care of Mr. Lloyd, for whom he always entertained the greateſt regard. From Shrewſbury ſchool he was removed to St. John's College, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, of which College he became a Fellow, on the 22d of January, 1716-17. His election at ſo early a period of life was owing to a number of vacancies, occaſioned by the removal of ſeveral Non-juring Fellows, in conſequence of an Act of Parliament. The reputation which Mr. Clarke acquired, when young, was ſuch, that he was choſen to be Chaplain to Dr. Adam Ottley, Biſhop of St. David's: but this Prelate dying in 1723, our author doth not appear to have received any advantage from the appointment. He was afterwards domeſtic Chaplain to Thomas Holles, Duke of Newcaſtle; in which ſituation he probably did not continue long, as, in 1724, he was preſented, by Archbiſhop Wake, to the Rectory of Buxted, in Suſſex. This promotion was conferred upon him, without any ſolicitation of his own, partly on account of his extraordinary merit, and partly from a regard to the ſpecial recommendation of the learned Dr. William Wotton, whoſe daughter he married (a). To what circumſtances it was owing we cannot tell, but Mr. Clarke was late in taking his degrees; not commencing Bachelor of Arts till 1731, or Maſter of Arts till 1735 (b). In 1738, he was made Prebendary and Reſidentiary of the Cathedral Church of Chicheſter (c). Some years before this he had given to the public a ſpecimen of his literary abilities, in a preface to his father-in-law Dr. Wotton's "Leges Walliæ Eccleſi-"aſticæ

" asticæ & Civiles Hoeli Boni, & aliorum Walliæ Principum;" or Ecclesiastical and Civil Laws of Howel, D Da, and other Princes of Wales (d). There is reason, likewise, to surmize, that an excellent "Discourse on the Commerce of the Romans," which was highly extolled by Dr. Taylor, in his "Elements of the Civil Law," might have been written by our author. It came either from his hand or from that of his friend Mr. Bowyer, and is reprinted in that Gentleman's Miscellaneous Tracts (e). But Mr. Clarke's chief work was, "The Connexion of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins; "deducing the Antiquities, Customs, and Manners of each People to modern Times; "particularly the Origin of Feudal Tenures, and of Parliaments: Illustrated throughout with critical and historical Remarks on various Authors, both sacred and profane." This work was published, in one volume, quarto, in 1767; and its appearance from the press was owing to the discovery made by Martin Folkes, Esq; of the old Saxon pound. It was dedicated to the Duke of Newcastle, whose beneficent disposition is celebrated for having conferred obligations upon the author, which were not the effects of importunity (f). Mr. Clarke's performance was perused in manuscript by Arthur Onslow, Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons, who honoured him with some useful hints and observations: but he was chiefly indebted to Mr. Bowyer, who took upon him all the care of the publication, drew up several of the notes, wrote part of the dissertation on the Roman sesterce, and formed an admirable index to the whole (g). By this work, of which a particular account will be given below [A], our author acquired a great

[A] Of which a particular account will be given below.] If any person should recollect his having seen this account before, we beg leave to observe, that it was originally drawn up by the writer of the present life.

The subject which Mr. Clarke hath chosen, promises, upon the very face of it, much curious and difficult enquiry; but he has extended his views still farther than could, at first, be expected. Some of his disquisitions might, indeed, on a hasty judgment, be thought to fly too far from his main point; but, when we take in the whole object he has in view, we shall find that they rise out of it, and are connected with it in a peculiar manner.

'The appearance of the following sheets from the press, says our learned Author in his preface, is entirely owing to the discovery, made by the late Martin Folkes, Esq; of the old Saxon pound. Without this previous knowledge, any work of this kind had been but a vain amusement, or very little more than arbitrary and precarious conjectures. For had there been no standard to have recourse to, no sure ground for forming the necessary calculations, how was it possible to take a single step, that could give any tolerable satisfaction? But upon this opening, I thought it would not be very difficult to throw a little more light upon this obscure subject, the Saxon money; and vindicate an authority, which had been for some ages almost entirely given up, or at least understood in such a manner as was very far from its original intention; I mean, Archbishop Aelfric's account of the Saxon coins; who distributes them into three classes, the MANCUS, the SHILLING, and the PENNY.'—

'Embarking upon this narrow bottom, I little thought of being carried so wide off the point, from whence I first set out: but, in passing on, I soon found that this was unavoidable. As the Saxon money had some connexion with the Roman, there was a necessity of comparing its weight and value in those instances with the Roman coins, and stating the usual Saxon methods of payment upon that plan. This, however, was far from being a disagreeable office: it was enquiring into the customs of politer ages, and discovering, what perhaps was not much expected, the incredible poverty of the greatest empire in the world, even when in its full power, long before its division, and much more its final dissolution in the west. Closing the account at this period would have saved me a good deal of trouble, if the prospect that lay before me would have suffered me to stop here: but there was another disquisition to be made, and that, by traversing much darker regions. There was no discovering the weight and origin of the Saxon gold coins without passing through that most intricate and confused labyrinth, the accounts given of the Aurei in the middle ages, from the Roman to the Norman times. Here I was prepared to expect and meet with very considerable difficulties. For perhaps all the materials, that are now left, are scarcely capable of forming such conclusions, as will carry with them a full and absolute conviction. But I have endeavoured to bring such as occurred to me into some order, made them at least intelligible, and by this means applicable to some useful purposes. For the subject of this enquiry is not quite so inconsiderable, as it may appear to be at first view: it has a near relation to those parts of history that are more interesting. The revenues of princes, the fines and penalties of their laws, the tributes imposed by conquerors, the subsidies stipulated by allies, and even the expences of private life, with which the manners and characters of an age must be unavoidably connected, will be but imperfectly understood, without being competently well acquainted with the value of their money.

'Having gone through the necessary parts of this enquiry, the dry detail and estimates of the Aurei in those barbarous ages, I was willing to indulge myself in making a few more agreeable excursions; persuaded that the present age, which has made such a progress in illustrating our own antiquities, would not be displeased with any rational researches upon that subject, and especially any modest attempts towards setting the origin of our own nation, our parliaments, and other national customs, in a juster light. Besides these, such incidental points, as have fallen within the compass of their disquisitions, may, to the friends of politer learning, furnish a more agreeable amusement. In opening the connexion of the Roman customs with our own, I have, as occasion offered, corrected and explained several passages in their ancient writers, or restored them again, from the hands of critics, to their true reading.

'The analogy between our old Saxon weights, and those of a more remote antiquity, led me into a very particular enquiry upon that subject; and convinced me, that a more concise and satisfactory account of the ancient nummulary and commercial pound might be easily drawn up. For who is not lost in that variety of ancient pounds, which the very learned Dr. Edward Bernard has given with such elaborate precision? Or, who is satisfied with the libræ, minæ, antiquæ, mediæ, imminutæ, of other celebrated authors, without knowing when they altered, or what was the difference? The great and obvious agreement in the divisions, uses, and proportions of these ancient weights, is a strong presumption that they were originally formed upon the same plan, in imitation of one another; and that we should not fall into any very considerable mistakes, if we supposed that the ancient accounts of money, whether of Jews, Greeks, or Romans, might be taken at a common estimate. In this view, I have ventured to give a new valuation of all the Jewish money in the Old Testament, from the most ancient and respectable authorities; which has the appearance of removing all those difficulties great and juſt reputation. Indeed, it reflects honour upon the country by which it is produced; for there are few performances that are more replete with profound and curious difficulties and objections, with which this ſubject has been attended.'

Mr. Clarke, having thus explained the nature and extent of his plan, begins his firſt chapter, which is upon the different accounts of the Saxon money, with remarking, that it is not much above two centuries, ſince ancient coins were conſidered as any part of the antiquities of a country: 'but, ſays he, when the arts improved, and coins began to be collected, they ſoon grew into eſteem. It was obſerved, that they were capable of furniſhing materials for moſt parts of hiſtory; that their evidence was original and authentic; and therefore whatſoever light might be drawn from them, even in the moſt barbarous countries, it was an acquiſition not to be deſpiſed. For this reaſon there has been, ever ſince the revival of polite learning, a great variety of writers upon the ſubject of ancient coins: many large collections have been publiſhed: moſt of the European nations have had the pleaſure of ſeeing one very entertaining part of their antiquities exhibited in theſe remains.' Among the authors of our own country, ſeveral of whom are here mentioned, Mr. Folkes tells us, what was "the weight of the Saxon pound; and that the coins of the two firſt kings after the conqueſt agree, as nearly as can be judged, in weight and goodneſs, with the pennies of the Saxon kings, their immediate predeceſſors." 'The weight of the old Saxon pound, continues Mr. Clarke, was a new and conſiderable diſcovery, and gave ſuch an opening, as hath induced me to carry theſe enquiries ſomething higher; to obſerve how the Saxon coins were firſt introduced; from what models they were taken; and whence that cuſtom of computing by pounds, ſhillings, and pence, which has diſtinguiſhed our money-accounts for ſo many ages, was moſt probably derived. It may be poſſible, by tracing theſe cuſtoms from one age and country to another, to find out their true ſources.'

Our learned Author would not, however, have thought of ſearching into the rude remains of the Saxon government, in its earlieſt and darkeſt period, if one advantage had not been entirely overlooked. 'The Saxon money, ſays he, lies in a ſort of intermediate ſtate, between two extremes, that are tolerably well known: it muſt therefore have ſome relation to both thoſe extremes, with which it is connected. In the concluſion of this government, this connexion is very plain: the Saxon and Norman money is almoſt the ſame thing: it has the ſame weight and fineneſs of the metal, the ſame rudeneſs and want of ſkill in the execution. Theſe coins differ only, as coins of the ſame age and country, in the different heads and legends of the princes and perſons by whom they were ſtruck. No doubt there was almoſt the ſame agreement between the Roman and Saxon coins at the beginning of this period; though for want of better evidence it is not eaſily diſcovered. Who would think, that the current money of his preſent Majeſty had any ſort of relation to that of Edward the Confeſſor, if all the intermediate evidence were deſtroyed? But as it is not, we find that the mint-maſters and moneyers, though they introduced many occaſional, gradual, and neceſſary alterations, as the public exigencies or opulence required, went upon the ſame plan. There is ſtill the ſame number of pence in the Engliſh pound, that there was in the Confeſſor's time: our diviſions in the pound are not in the leaſt different from his, though the pound itſelf, from being a real, is become a nominal valuation: almoſt two thirds of it are vaniſhed. The number of ſhillings is reduced from ſixty to twenty; and yet the preſent ſhilling is within a few grains of the ſame weight and value, as the ſhilling of the later Saxon Kings.'—

'The caſe of the Roman and Saxon coins cannot be very different from this: they paſſed currently together, or the one ſucceeded the other almoſt immediately in the ſame country; and as far as there was any occaſion to exchange the ſeveral ſorts of coin, the weight and fineneſs of them muſt eſtabliſh a regular proportion, as the foundation of this traffic. Beſides, the Germans were no ſtrangers to the Roman cuſtoms. We learn, from an obſervation of Tacitus, that they were as good judges of the value of the Roman money, as the Romans themſelves.—Rome had for ſome ages been obliged to furniſh annual ſubſidies to the German Princes.' This Mr. Clarke hath proved, by a detail of ſeveral curious particulars, and then proceeds to obſerve, 'that Princes who had ſuch a continual intercourſe with Rome, muſt be extremely well acquainted with the Roman money, which had paſſed in commerce, or been taken in pay or plunder, for many ages. It was undoubtedly the moſt current money upon the frontiers of their own country; and when they ſtruck any coins of their own, they muſt paſs according to that value and currency which the Roman coins had eſtabliſhed. For gold and ſilver had, by the common conſent of all nations, acquired a known and ſettled valuation. It was made the balance of trade, which would not entirely ſubmit to the mere will and pleaſure of the moſt arbitrary Princes. The Saxons indeed, when they arrived in Britain, came into a province, which by the rapine, or ambition of its governors, had been much plundered and oppreſſed; but not quite exhauſted either of men or money. And though they made no great figure at their firſt ſettlement, yet, when all their petty governments were united in one kingdom, they were a riſing people; they began to encourage trade; to form connexions with thoſe parts of Europe which had been Roman provinces; and even with the remains of that empire, from whence many of their cuſtoms were imported. Hence, therefore, we may well imagine, that the Roman money, which had been for ſo many ages the current caſh of all Europe, was the ſtandard by which the value of their gold and ſilver was adjuſted; and the model, which they would be moſt inclined to follow in making their own. From this ſource it was moſt probably derived; and though our coins have taken very different forms, as they came down to us through a long ſucceſſion of Northern princes, yet, if we examine their original, they will appear to be, like the King's own family, of ROMAN EXTRACTION.

Our learned author paſſes on, from theſe obſervations, to conſider what the Saxon coins were; and obſerves, that Dr. Hickes has given us the beſt account of their money. This account he has preſented to his readers, and, after pointing out the miſtakes and defects of Hickes, Fleetwood, and Hooper upon the ſubject, he ſhews that the Saxons, like the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, divided their money-pound into twelve ounces. 'But, continues Mr. Clarke, to know the diviſion of their pound would be a matter of very little conſequence, unleſs the weight of it was known. We ſhould otherwiſe have no certain ſtandard by which we could examine their coins, or judge of the proportion they bore to thoſe of other nations. We are much indebted to the late Mr. Folkes for this diſcovery: he has given us two eſtimates of the Saxon pound, both of which I ſhall produce in his own words. Table of Engliſh ſilver coins, p. 1, 2.

"It is reaſonable to think that William the Conqueror introduced no new weight into his mints; but that the ſame weight uſed there for ſome ages, and called the pound of the Tower, was the old pound of the Saxon monyers before the Conqueſt. This pound was lighter than the Troy pound by three quarters of an ounce Troy."

'Mr. Folkes gives us this eſtimate of the Saxon pound from very good authority, from a verdict relating to the coinage, 18 Henry VIII. 1527, now remaining in the Exchequer, in which are the following words: "And whereas heretofore the merchaunte paid for coynage of every pounde Towre of fyne golde, weighing xi oz. quarter Troye, ii. s. vi. d. Nowe it is determined by the Kings highneſs, and his ſaid counſelle, that the foreſaid pounde Towre, ſhall be no more uſed, and occupied; but al maner of golde and ſylver ſhall be wayed by the pounde Troye, which maketh xii. oz. Troye, which excedith the pounde Towre in weight iii. quarters of the oz." He refers us likewiſe to another authority much older, rious learning. Mr. Clarke's laſt promotions were the Chancellorſhip of the Church of Chicheſter, and the Vicarage of Amport, which were beſtowed upon him in 1770. Theſe older, taken from the regiſter of the chamber of accounts at Paris. The difference of the ſeveral pounds then made uſe of in that kingdom is there computed, and the proportion between the Troy and Engliſh pounds is thus eſtimated. "Ou royaume ſouloit avoir iv. Marcs: c'eſt aſſavoir le Marc de Troyes, qui poiſe xiv. Sols, ii. Den. eſterlins de poix . . . . le Merc de la Rochelle, dit d'Angleterre, qui poiſe viii. S. iv. Den. eſterlins de poix."

'This account was moſt probably taken about the beginning of Edward the Third's reign, not long after A.D. 1329; and as the proportion is here given by Mr. Folkes, the weight of the Rochelle or Engliſh pound will be found 451,76 Engliſh grains, ſomething heavier than the former.

'The difference between theſe two eſtimates is ſo inconſiderable, that either of them will anſwer our purpoſe, and ſhew, if not exactly, yet very nearly, the weight of the old Saxon pound. But of the two I ſhould prefer the laſt, becauſe it was ſo much nearer the Saxon times; and eſtimating the weight of the ſeveral pounds, was not an incidental point, as in the former caſe, but the very buſineſs of the writer; and becauſe (which Mr. Folkes did not ſeem to ſuſpect) the Troy pound had been eſtabliſhed in our mints; and the old Tower pound quite diſuſed, ſome years before that eſtimate of Henry the Eighth was taken. But both theſe computations are ſo near each other, that they were certainly taken from the ſame pound, and have in proportion a much greater agreement, than the coins which were ſtruck out of it.'

It is no wonder indeed, that the Saxons were very far from being exact in the weight of their coins, when the Romans themſelves, in much more elegant and polite ages, were almoſt as careleſs in this particular. The inaccuracy of the Romans, the Saxons, and even of the Engliſh moneyers in later times, with regard to this matter, is fully diſplayed by our Author; which ſhews, ſays he, how precarious thoſe concluſions muſt be, which determine the weight of the pound from the weight of any particular coin. How many different Saxon pounds will be produced from ſuch calculations? How ridiculous would it be to expect an exact agreement in the weight of their money, when their Anglo-Norman ſucceſſors, and even the Romans themſelves, were ſo careleſs in this reſpect.

The buſineſs of making exact calculations, was a point very little practiſed or underſtood in thoſe ages. We ſee this in our moſt public acts: where the wiſdom and juſtice of the nation were concerned, they did not give themſelves the trouble of carrying the rules of proportion to any critical exactneſs. In the famous ſtatute of 51 Henry III. made to regulate the aſſize of bread, where an exact proportion between the price of wheat and the weight of bread was moſt probably intended, it is, however, very ſeldom obſerved. The ſtatute ſays, 'That when a quarter of wheat is ſold for a iii. ſhillings and vi. pence, then a waſtel bread of a farthing ſhall weigh two pounds two ſhillings.' But, according to the proportion which the ſtatute ſets out with, the weight of this bread ought to have been one pound, eighteen ſhillings and ten pence. We meet with ſeveral miſtakes of this ſort in that ſtatute, which is the firſt public act now remaining, that was made after the cities and boroughs were repreſented in parliament. Theſe new members ſhewed a proper regard to the intereſts of their conſtituents by this new law. For it was highly requiſite, that in ſuch large and populous diſtricts, as many of them repreſented, the weight of bread ſhould be adjuſted by law.

The ſecond chapter of this learned work treats of the Saxon pound, the ſeveral ancient pounds, their uſe and application, and on the different origin of the Teutonic and Celtic nations; and it is introduced, by our Author, with obſerving, that 'Jo. Fred. Gronovius and Biſhop Hooper were of opinion, that the Saxons, at their firſt ſettlements in this iſland, made uſe of ſuch weights and meaſures, as they found here; which were undoubtedly Roman. This opinion, as to the evidence then in being, before the old Tower pound was diſcovered, was a very probable conjecture: but it is now certain they did not: the Saxons brought their own weights and meaſures along with them from Germany. Their pound was conſiderably heavier than the higheſt eſtimate, which has been made of the Roman; and differs, as Mr. Folkes has obſerved, very little from the Colonia weight, which is ſtill uſed by the Germans in all the money affairs of that country.' Mr. Clarke, by the aſſiſtance of Mr. Eiſenſchmid, has compared the two moſt ancient German pounds, the Cologn, and the Straſburg, with the Saxon; and conſidering that the eſtimates were taken in different ages and countries, they have a moſt remarkable agreement. They do not differ ſo much from one another, as the very ſtandards of the Straſburg pound, which have in all appearance been carefully preſerved in their public offices, differ from themſelves. There is therefore great reaſon to believe, they were all originally the very ſame pound.—The immemorial uſage of this pound in Germany, and in this Iſland from the firſt arrival of the Saxons till Henry the Seventh's time, proves its great antiquity: that it was common to the whole Teutonic nation: that it ſpread through all its branches, and was carried abroad with them in all their different ſettlements and emigrations.

'Where it is neceſſary, continues our Author, to carry on a conſtant traffic, an agreement in this point is a matter of no ſmall moment. It was formerly thought ſo conſiderable, that, in the famous Achean league, the aſſociated cities were obliged to uſe the ſame weights and meaſures by one of their articles. But as the moſt ancient Germans were never formed into any ſettled communities; as they conſiſted of many roving bodies, which were perpetually invading and diſlodging one another, their agreement in weights and meaſures was rather owing to immemorial uſage, than any definitive and public treaties. There was neither ſo much harmony, nor ſo much trade among them, as to give this matter ſuch a ſolemn deciſion. This nummulary pound therefore was moſt probably as ancient as their firſt ſettlements, and took its riſe from the very beginning of commerce among that people, which was at firſt begun, and carried on for ſeveral ages with the Greeks. This appears from hiſtory, from the oldeſt and beſt authorities; and their pound agrees with that original: it is the very ſame as the ancient Greek pound. Dr. Arbuthnot makes the Greek ounce 455,33 Troy grains, not a grain heavier than the Straſburg.

'But leſt this agreement ſhould appear merely accidental, and conſequently not worth our notice; or this opinion be thought nothing more than a random conjecture, which deſerves no credit; I think it neceſſary to enlarge a little upon this point, and ſhew what reaſons we have for concluding, that our old Saxon pound, the ſame which was univerſally uſed by the ancient Germans, was of Greek original.'

In the proſecution of this ſubject, Mr. Clarke has diſplayed a great variety of curious learning, and the arguments produced by him appear to have much weight. Direct teſtimonies, indeed, are not here to be expected. Mankind, in the early ages of the world, had no concern about tranſmitting an account of things preſent; and much leſs of enquiring after what was paſt. But that the Saxon pound was taken from the Greek, is capable of being evinced by ſuch proofs, as the nature of the thing, at this diſtance of time, admits; proofs drawn from ſimilar cuſtoms, mutual commerce, and original deſcent.

Firſt then, the Saxon meaſures of length are the ſame, or very nearly the ſame, with the Greek.—Now, to refer the analogy between the Greek and Saxon weights and meaſures to mere accident only is ſaying nothing; or what is next to nothing, that no reaſon at all can be given for a fact, which cannot be accounted for without one. It was ten thouſand to one, that there ſhould be exactly the ſame proportion between their weights and meaſures, if they were taken up only by chance.—The forming the greater

These preferments he did not long live to enjoy, departing this life on the 21ſt of October, in the following year. He had reſigned, in 1768, the Rectory of Buxted to his weights and eſtimates upon the ſame combinations of the pound is another evidence of their coming from the ſame original. The Romans, in their money affairs, made no uſe of the talent, except in their treaties and tranſactions with the Greeks and ſome eaſtern nations.—The Greeks uſe it perpetually, and their nummulary talent was ſixty pounds. The word talent does not, perhaps, occur in the preſent remains of the Saxon language; but the weight, the eſtimate does exactly; for their laws have rated their greater fines in this proportion.—The taking up ſuch an uncommon way of computation, as was uſed by no other European nation but the Greeks, can hardly be thought the work of chance. If the Saxons had not been accuſtomed to uſe that eſtimate, they would moſt probably have ſettled their large fines in round numbers by the hundred, as the Danes afterwards did their tributes, at 200 or 3000 pounds. There can be no queſtion but that the Saxon laws concerning fines were formed upon the particular proportion of the Greek talent; ſince Mr. Folkes has informed us, that the talent weight continues in our mint to this very day.—The common way, likewiſe, of reckoning money among the Saxons, has an appearance of coming from Greece. They did not compute ſums of money, as the Romans uſually did, and moſt of the European nations do at this day, by placing the whole ſum under leſſer denominations, as ſo many ſeſterces, livres, milrees, crowns, florins, dollars, &c. but by placing it under different articles, by pounds, ſhillings, and pence; juſt as the minæ, drachmæ, oboli of the Greeks.—It is farther obſervable, that the Saxon way of reckoning fractions, or parts of quantities, has that remarkable peculiarity, which is found in the Grecian manner of expreſſing four talents and a half, or ſix talents and a half, &c. and which has frequently been taken notice of as one of the Greek idioms. The ſame mode of expreſſion was very familiar among the Saxons, and was preſerved by all the different Teutonic branches.—' But this, ſays our learned Author, is not a ſingular inſtance of the agreement between the Greek and Saxon languages. They have in ſeveral reſpects a very particular reſemblance. Many of the primitive Saxon words are undoubtedly of Greek original: for if any words are truly primitive, thoſe that expreſs the elements, the common relations, and domeſtic concerns of life, muſt have the faireſt claim to that title; becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary from the beginning to have words to expreſs thoſe ideas. There could be no ſociety, no converſing at all without them.

Specimens of this affinity, taken chiefly from Mr. Camden's, Dr. Meric Caſaubon's, and Dr. Wallis's collections, are given by Mr. Clarke; and he hath pointed out ſeveral other analogies between the Greek and Saxon tongues, that are not ſo eaſily introduced as words. Having mentioned a number of inſtances, which ſhew the original and real character of the Saxon language, he obſerves, that occaſional and trading ſettlements, even in the longeſt intercourſe, are not capable of producing ſuch effects. We know this by experience, by a moſt remarkable inſtance in our own country. It is now above a thouſand years ſince the Britains and Saxons have lived together in this iſland; during a great part of that period, as one people, under the ſame government and the ſame laws, with all the free and friendly intercourſe imaginable. By this long and intimate connexion, the natives of Wales have enriched their own language by adopting a great many Engliſh words; but they are adopted in ſuch a manner, as to preſerve the form and idiom of their own tongue. They might indeed, had they been ſo diſpoſed, have changed their own language, as the Franks did in Gaul, and the Normans in England: but, without this, the peculiar caſt and genius of it will ſcarcely ever be entirely effaced. This is, in ſome degree, the caſe of our own language. The traces of the original and mother tongue are ſtill preſerved, after a great length of years, after a prodigious variety of new ſettlements, and very early and diſtant migrations.'

But that our author's reaſonings on the ſubject are not fanciful and precarious obſervations, depending upon analogy and conjecture only, without any authority to ſupport them, he ſhews by an appeal to Ovid's plaintive epiſtles, written during his exile, in which we have ſuch an evidence in this caſe, as is beyond all exception. Ovid lived ſome years in Pontus, where the Greek and Gothic languages were both the living languages of the country. He obſerved the great affinity between them; and ſays, though the Getic tongue was much altered and diſguiſed by a barbarous pronunciation, yet there were evident marks left of its Greek original.—No perſon was better qualified to determine this queſtion, than Ovid was: he underſtood Greek well, and could ſpeak all the languages, then ſpoken upon the weſtern banks of the Euxine, and has done us the honour to place himſelf at the head of the Gothic writers.

' I have been more particular, ſays Mr. Clarke, in collecting theſe grammatical obſervations, becauſe I apprehend they are of ſome moment in the preſent queſtion. They prove, at leaſt, that there was a long intercourſe between the two nations; and are no bad reaſon for aſcribing the Saxon weights and meaſures to the Greeks. This evidence ariſing from the analogy between the two languages has opened upon us by degrees, and received the ſuffrage of very able judges. Every enquiry has thrown in ſome new light, and from very different quarters.' Henry Stephens was the firſt perſon who made the obſervation, and after him, Joſeph Scaliger and Mr. Camden fell into the ſame track. They went no farther, however, than the fact itſelf, without drawing any concluſions from it. But Salmaſius, Francis Junius, and Meric Caſaubon carried their obſervations much farther; and concluded from hence, that the Greek and Gothic languages, ſo ſimilar in many reſpects, came undoubtedly from a common patent. Mr. Somner and Mr. Sheringham were in the ſame ſentiments, to whom may be added Dr. Wallis and Dr. Hickes, who have confirmed the opinion which Salmaſius and others have advanced by ſeveral inſtances not obſerved before.

' The preſumptive evidence, which ariſes from the nature of the Gothic language, is much ſtrengthened and confirmed by the origin of their trade. For weights and meaſures are the neceſſary effects of commerce, and uſually taken from thoſe people who introduce it into a country. The Goths were, from the very early ages, ſeated on the weſtern ſide of the Euxine. Whatever gave occaſion to the firſt openings of trade among them, the perſons who firſt engaged in it, and greatly cultivated this branch of commerce, were certainly the Greeks.' Our author has here taken occaſion to ſet before his readers an entertaining account of the trade which was carried on in Thrace, by the Grecians, and eſpecially by the Athenians. The commerce was not only extenſive, but the effects of it in that country were remarkably great. Herodotus aſſures us, "That all along the weſtern coaſt of the Euxine, ſome of the inhabitants were a ſort of half Greeks, others originally of Greek extraction: that their houſes, their temples, their images, their altars, were made after the taſte and manner of the Greeks." Pliny, Jornandes, and Arrian, have left teſtimonies to the ſame purpoſe.

' Such, continues Mr. Clarke, was the commercial intercourſe between the Goths and the Greeks: it began early, and continued long. To find out their original connexions we muſt look higher, and ſearch into a more remote antiquity. Clear and diſtinct accounts of the origin of nations are not to be expected. The world was peopled many ages before the firſt ſettlements in any country were thought worth recording. The infancy of every ſtate was like that of Rome: their chief buſineſs was to increaſe and multiply: when this was done, colonies threw themſelves off from their mother country, not regarding whence they came, or whither they were going, any farther than it contributed to ſecure their liberty, or enlarge their poſſeſſions. Upon this account, it very ſeldom happens, that we can poſſibly trace out the deſcent of nations, becauſe of the inſuperable difficulties occaſioned by defective evidence; or, what is ſtill worſe, the falſe evidence ariſing from traditionary impoſture: for to be miſled is often more dangerous than not to be directed. But in the preſent caſe, we have clear accounts from hiſtorians of unqueſtionable credit, that the Goths were deſcended from the Thracians. The next ſtep is not quite ſo clear: and it is ſcarcely poſſible it ſhould. For it is in hiſtory, as in nature: diſtant objects grow darker, as they ſtand more remote. Whatever light may have fallen upon them, moſt of it is loſt, before it reaches us, and conſequently they muſt become more uncertain and obſcure. But, by connecting the ſeveral parts of this hiſtory, there is light enough left to convince us, that the Greeks and Thracians came from a common ſtock, and were only different clans of the ſame people.'

Mr. Clarke confirms this opinion by a variety of arguments; and he obſerves, that Thrace was the great eaſtern hive, from whence all the numerous Teutonic branches were deſcended. The Getæ were originally Thracians; and the Getæ, Gothi, Daci, were but different names for the ſame people. The Goths and Germans were undoubtedly ſiſter-nations; branches from a common ſtock. Colonies of the Getæ long before Strabo's time, from a very remote antiquity, were ſpread over Germany, and extended from the Euxine, as far as the banks of the Rhine. The facts, in general, which our learned Author has produced, are ſo well atteſted by the united ſuffrage of the moſt ancient hiſtorians, and confirmed by ſo many concurring circumſtances, that he looks upon it as a clear and indiſputable point, that the Saxons and Thracians came from a common origin with the Greeks. The Saxons themſelves, though at firſt without letters, preſerved, in all their ſeparate diviſions, a dark traditionary account of this original.—Thus there are many preſumptive proofs of the primitive connexions which there muſt have been between the Greeks and the Goths, both by commerce and deſcent. The whole appearance is uniform and conſiſtent. Every opening leads to the ſame place, and has the ſame point in view, viz. that the remarkable agreement between the Greek and Saxon weights and meaſures was not owing to any caſual coincidence; but that they were truly of Greek original.

From the account which Mr. Clarke has given of the weight and origin of the Saxon pound, he concludes, firſt, that the true reaſon why the Saxon or Engliſh pound was called the pound ſterling, was its being brought by their anceſtors from the moſt eaſtern parts of Europe, the ſhores of the Euxine; and ſecondly, that this diſtinction of the eaſtern and weſtern, or Greek and Roman pounds, continuing for ſo many ages, and in the ſame proportion, is an evidence that the pounds themſelves were always of the ſame weight, without any conſiderable variation. Hence likewiſe, he takes occaſion to correct a miſtake of Biſhop Hooper, who aſcribes the origin of the Engliſh weights and meaſures to the Saracens; and another of Dr. Hickes, who, though he was right in concluding that there muſt be fifteen ounces in the Saxon pound, miſtook the commercial for the nummulary weights; the pound uſed in the ports, for that in the exchequer. Our Author here enters into a curious conſideration of the difference which has always ſubſiſted between the nummulary and commercial pounds, and then returns to the Saxon pound, with regard to which he takes notice, that it is very evident, that the pound of fifteen ounces, ſpoken of by Dr. Hickes, was the commercial pound. The Saxon practice was the ſame, as that of the Romans and Greeks before them: though they had two pounds, one for the exchequer, and one for trade, yet the ounces were the ſame in both; the commercial pound differing from the other only in the number of ounces.

'The difference, continues Mr. Clarke, between the Saxon mercantile pound of fifteen ounces, and the Roman of ſixteen, was inconſiderable: they might mutually paſs for each other in trade without any inconvenience, juſt as the Greek and Roman money did, where there was much the ſame difference. But this is demonſtration that the Saxons did not make uſe of the Roman weights and meaſures; otherwiſe they had taken this pound of ſixteen ounces for their traffic.—The Norman kings made no innovations in this matter.—All the ſubſequent princes followed the ſame rule; and it was at laſt eſtabliſhed by magna charta. Fleta proves, that this uſage continued to his time, and moſt probably till the beginning of Edward the Third. For in his ninth year, the prohibition upon foreign merchants was entirely taken off, and they were at liberty to buy all averdupois wares, and merchandizes, &c. at any place within the realm, and ſell them to any perſon whatſoever, excepting the King's enemies. This, I believe, is the firſt mention of averdupois wares and merchandiſes in our laws. Our foreign trade was then much enlarged; and along with it this averdupois Roman pound was moſt probably adopted, to comply with the uſage of the Italian merchants, who were then far more conſiderable than our own. The conqueſts of this great Prince, his ſucceſs at home and abroad, all his military virtues, are much celebrated: but the progreſs he made in trade, which was not inferior to the other glories of his reign, and much more to the advantage of his country, hath been ſeldom obſerved. Mr. Addiſon tells us, that, by an eſtimate taken in Edward the Third's time, it appeared, that the balance of trade in our favour was then above a quarter of a million, a very conſiderable ſum in thoſe days. The averdupois pound, made familiar by this increaſe of commerce, and the encouragement then given to foreign merchants, and being more convenient in its ſubdiviſions than the Saxon, has continued ever ſince, and is now ſpread ſo far into our numerous and diſtant colonies, that it ſeems to be as perpetually, as it was firſt ſilently, eſtabliſhed. — The Saxon nummulary pound was continued here for ſome centuries longer, till A.D. 1498, the 12th of Henry the Seventh, when it was exchanged for the Troy weight.'

It appears, likewiſe, by this account of the origin of the Saxon pound, that Grotius, Sheringham, Gronovius, and Sir William Temple, were much miſtaken in aſſerting, that the Goths and Saxons firſt ſettled in Sweden, and came from the ſides of the Baltick to their new conqueſts and dominions in Europe. Our Author thinks that ſuch a miſtake was pardonable in Sir William Temple; but that it was not ſo excuſable in Grotius, Sheringham, and Gronovius, profeſſed ſcholars, who had made this queſtion the ſubject of a particular enquiry.—Going to Sweden is loſing time, and taking the wrong way: it is like ſearching out the fountain by falling down the ſtream; or, what is almoſt the ſame thing, it is being ſent to Iceland, the Orcades, and God knows whither, for the firſt ſettlements in Europe. The very country forbids ſuch a concluſion: the progreſs of light and learning was always from the eaſt. Jornandes was undoubtedly the parent of this ſtrange miſtake; in oppoſition to whom Mr. Clarke confirms his own ſentiments by ſome additional remarks; and then ſteps a little out of his way to obviate an opinion lately revived by a conſiderable French writer, Pelloutier, which is, that the Celts and Germans were originally the ſame people. Againſt this opinion, our Author has alledged ſeveral arguments and teſtimonies which are deſerving of attention; but we do not altogether agree with him in his concluſion, that the Celts were originally Tyrian or Phœnician colonies. This hypotheſis is, as we apprehend, liable to many ſtrong, or, at leaſt, plauſible objections. The remainder of the ſecond chapter contains ſome curious obſervations on the reaſon why the ſeven days of the week were diſtinguiſhed by the names of the ſeven planets, and is concluded in the following manner:

'The late Lord Bolingbroke has aſſerted, that the original of nations is too improbable, and too ill vouched, to procure any degree of belief. It is not indeed to great advantage as a man of piety, a friend, and a ſcholar (i). One paſſage, which ſhews the diſpoſition of his mind in a very agreeable point of view, we ſhall tranſcribe. "I find indeed to be expected, that great geniuſes ſhould ſubmit to the low office of making ſuch reſearches; where, to collect the evidence, and connect its ſeveral parts, is a work of ſome time and trouble. It is aſking too much of them to believe what they are not diſpoſed to examine; or, that theſe maſter-builders ſhould ſubmit to the judgment and direction of under-workmen. Beſides, his lordſhip might have been offended at the thoughts of having his anceſtors come from Aſia, eſpecially of having them brought from the plains of Shinar. Nor ſhall I attempt it: going up to the origin of the Gothic nations is going high enough for my purpoſe: though, if I were diſpoſed to carry it a ſtep higher, it might eaſily be done: his own favourite author, Strabo, would ſupport me. But I have at preſent no ſuch views; nor is it any part of my buſineſs. I am content with aſſigning the origin of our Saxon weights and meaſures, and then leaving our anceſtors, juſt where I find them, upon the ſides of the Helleſpont, and Euxine; looking indeed as if they came from Aſia,

'Tendenteſque manus ripæ ulterioris amore.'

Mr. Clarke's third chapter, which treats on the ſhilling and thrimſa of the Saxons, their methods of paying money, the Roman miliarenſis, and the innovations in the nummulary language of the Romans, contains a profuſion of learning, and furniſhes ample matter of attention and enquiry to the Antiquary and the Critic. Our author opens this chapter with proving, that the word ſhilling came from the Latin ſicilicus, which ſignified, in that language, a quarter of an ounce; and he obſerves, that the ſhilling kept its original ſignification, and bore the ſame proportion in the Saxon pound, as ſicilicus did in the Roman and the Greek: it was exactly the forty-eighth part of the Saxon pound. The Saxons, in their money-computations, made ſome difference in reckoning the pound by tale and by weight; and Mr. Clarke ſhews that this cuſtom began long before, and continued long after, the Saxon times; after which, he gives an elaborate account of the Saxon ſhilling, and the Roman coins, together with the alterations they became liable to at various periods. In the courſe of his enquiries into theſe ſubjects, he hath diſcuſſed ſeveral queſtions relative to the aureus, the miliarenſis, and other pieces of money, and has taken particular pains to correct the miſtakes into which Gronovius has fallen, in his book de ſeſtertiis. In our author's Hiſtory of the Saxon ſhilling, we meet with ſome circumſtances which may ſerve to convince us, that our anceſtors were richer than is generally ſuppoſed. The ſhilling, ſays he, was coined, at firſt, for what the word ſignified, a quarter of an ounce; and at laſt for the fifth part of it. This alteration happened in Edward the Firſt, or Athelſtan's reign; and was probably owing to the incurſions and depredations of the Danes. They had for ſome time harraſſed almoſt all Europe by perpetual invaſions. We ſuffered in common with our neighbours. It is amazing how a nation at that time with little trade, without any ſupplies at home, and under a perpetual ravage from abroad, could ſupport the great tributes and exactions, which were then paid or taken by military execution. The Saxons were undoubtedly poſſeſſed of much more caſh, not long after their firſt ſettlements, than is commonly imagined. When Ina the Weſt-Saxon carried his arms into Kent to revenge the death of Mollo his predeceſſor's brother, that ſingle county raiſed, if we can depend upon Malmſbury, 30,000 marks of gold, by way of contribution to purchaſe peace. The Saxon Chronicle informs us, that in twenty-ſeven years they paid above 207,000l. in tributes, an immenſe ſum! equal to eight or nine millions now; beſides the much greater ſums, that were wreſted out of their hands by the plunder of their country. This is the obſervation of Aſſer, one of the Weſt-Saxon Biſhops, who knew the truth of it by a ſorrowful experience, that the Danes looked upon theſe tributes, as the leaſt profitable part of their expeditions, majorem pecuniam furtiva præda, quam pace, adeptûri. It appears, on the other hand, from Mr. Clarke's account of the changes introduced in the Roman money, that the wealth of that great empire, no later than in the reign of Heraclius, was diminiſhed to a very narrow compaſs. The Conſuls, long before this, were obliged to make their donatives in ſilver only. And the Emperors at laſt did the ſame thing: they reduced their miſſilia to ſilver; firſt to tetra-drachms, and, in the beginning of the ſeventh century, to coins of half that value. How much was the caſh of that empire, which commanded the riches of almoſt the whole world, ſunk and diſſipated in a few centuries! An event, ſufficient to convince all future diſpenſers of public money, that, how great ſoever their funds are, they moſt certainly have a bottom. Thoſe Princes, who were ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed by their public donatives, and uſed to diſtribute their imperial munificence in gold, and ſometimes in pieces of great value, were reduced to the neceſſity of diſperſing this cuſtomary benevolence in didrachms, coins worth very little more than one of our preſent ſhillings. Indeed, ſuch was the poverty of the empire, ſo early as from the middle of the third century to the beginning of the fourth, and ſuch the confuſion of that period, that great innovations were made in the nummulary language of the Romans. Their denarius was much ſunk from its ancient figure and eſtimation; and to indulge themſelves in the pleaſing ſound of more property than they poſſeſſed, the names of the old ſilver coins were, by a ridiculous affectation, transferred to the braſs. Our learned author, among his other enquiries concerning the Roman ſicilicus, and the Saxon ſhilling, hath proved, at large, that they were actual coins; and that they were not merely denominations of money, as hath been aſſerted by Gronovius, with regard to the ſicilicus, and by Fleetwood and all our antiquaries, excepting Sir Andrew Fountaine, with reſpect to the ſhilling. In the diſcuſſion of theſe points, we meet with ſome curious criticiſms upon the ſcriptures, and upon Homer; and the chapter is concluded with an account of the Saxon thrimſa, which is ſhewn to have been three parts in five of the Saxon ſhilling, or three-pence. The thrimſa was firſt coined in the reigns before Athelſtan, during their greater affluence in caſh, and was deſigned purely for the convenience of exchange, as the propereſt diviſion that could be made in their money, without a fraction, between the ſhilling and the penny. But when the ſhilling was reduced, it was of little uſe, and by degrees entirely laid aſide. The way of computing by thrimſas was chiefly uſed in the more mercantile parts of this kingdom, among the Eaſt, and Weſt, and South-Saxons; and poſſibly coined only among them: for it appears that in the inland provinces, the Mercians reckoned generally by the ſhilling. An appendix is added to this chapter, to prove that the word nummus, in Plautus, is always uſed for the drachma; and that the ſhekel of the Hebrews was no more than a quarter of an ounce.

Mr. Clarke, in order to open his enquiry concerning the Saxon gold coins with greater freedom and advantage, begins his fourth chapter with an account of the ſeveral aurei, that were current in Europe from the decline of the Roman empire in the weſt to the Norman Conqueſt; and with an elaborate diſcuſſion of the proportion between gold and ſilver among the Romans, Franks, and Normans. After this he proceeds to ſhew that the Saxons had gold coins, and that the mancus, of which he gives the origin, hiſtory, and value, was a gold coin. He then goes on to the Daniſh mark and ora, with regard to which it appears that the ora was the ſame as the French ſolidus of that age, the eighth part of the mark, and that the Daniſh mark itſelf was no more than a hundred Saxon pennies. This mark was very different from the mark afterwards admitted as a nummulary ſtandard, the method of computation which our Author next conſiders; and then endeavours to prove, in oppoſition to the general opinion, that the ancient ſolidus was a gold coin, that it never was a ſilver one, and that there

" I find the Archbiſhop (Secker) and you are intimate: he truſts you with ſecrets. But " I could tell you a ſecret, which nobody knows but my wife, that if our Deanry
" ſhould

there was a real gold coin of that name. A point ſtill remaining to be determined was, when the diviſion of the preſent pound ſterling came into England. The Saxon pound in Alfred's time was eſtimated by a mancus of thirty pence, and eight to the pound; and a ſhilling of five pence, at forty-eight in the pound: when then did this alteration commence, which reduced it to a ſolidus of twelve pence, and twenty in the pound? That this eſtimate began in the Saxon times is very evident. All the revenues in England, during the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, were, as appears by Doomſday-book, uniformly and conſtantly accounted for by a ſoldius of twelve pence.—So far we may certainly trace the uſe of this ſolidus. But if any ſort of credit is to be given to the hiſtorians of that age, this practice muſt be carried up much higher. —It is certain, that there were ſome alterations made in the Saxon coinages, not long after Alfred's time. His grandſon Athelſtan, a prince extremely popular and well beloved, reduced the ſtandard of the Saxon ſhillings from five to four pence; and it was likewiſe enacted in his reign, that for the future there ſhould be but one ſort of money in England. To this period, therefore, Mr. Clarke refers the introduction of the diviſion of the preſent pound ſterling, and the change of the word mancus, from its original ſignification, to denote no more than a ſolidus of twelve pence; and he hath confirmed his hypotheſis by ſeveral probable arguments. Having occaſion to quote a law of Canute's, relative to the ſtandard of money, our Author thinks that he diſcovers in it the firſt appearance of feuds among the Saxons. At the end of the chapter, we are entertained with ſome curious obſervations on our gold coins, and with a hiſtory of the Anglo-Norman ſhilling, from the conqueſt to the 43d of Elizabeth. An appendix follows, on the weight of the Roman denarius, and the firſt exchange between gold and ſilver at Rome.

We now come to the fifth chapter, which is introduced with ſome remarks upon the ancient methods of weighing and paying money; and then Mr. Clarke proceeds to ſhew, that the coins of the weſtern nations were taken from the Romans. This he hath proved in a very clear and ſatisfactory manner, after which he carries on and compleats his hiſtory of the Saxon money. The coins here conſidered by him are the Saxon penny; the ſceatta, which was originally the fourth part of a penny, but afterwards was transferred to the penny; the hælfling, the farthing, and the ſtyca. Our Author has intermixed his conſiderations upon theſe ſubjects, with an explanation of the word Conob, which is found in the exergue of ſeveral ancient coins; and with an account of the Saxon convents and colleges. The meaning of Conob, he ſays, is *Con*ſtantinopolis *Ob*ryzum, or *Con*ſtantinopoli *Ob*ryzatum: money of the legal ſtandard in that city. As to the Saxon convents and colleges, he obſerves, that there were not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, any regular monaſtic foundations in England, in the time of Sigebert. Collegium and monaſterium were words of the ſame import, but none of them eſtabliſhed for the obſervance of any particular rule, or confined to votaries dedicated to the ſeverer auſterities of a monaſtic life. The Saxon monaſteries of that age were convents or colleges of ſecular clergy, married or unmarried, where youth were inſtructed, and perſons of rank and even of a military profeſſion had the privilege of retiring for the ſake of a ſequeſtered life, to be employed either in ſtudy or devotion. Along with theſe perſons, others of both ſexes, profeſſing the ſtricter diſcipline of a ſingle life, were equally admitted, and called monks or nuns; but, after this profeſſion, were allowed to marry, if they pleaſed. Of theſe mixed ſocieties muſt the Saxon monaſteries be underſtood.

Mr. Clarke has concluded his account of the Saxon coins with a table, exhibiting their names, weights, and values; the inſertion of which will, probably, be acceptable to our Readers, as it diſplays, at one view, his ſentiments upon theſe ſubjects.

Our learned Author has ſhewn, that all the firſt Frank and Gothic princes ſtruck their money upon the Roman models, and that ſome of our earlier Saxon princes did the ſame thing: and he obſerves, that the principle of imitation or improvement which induced them to copy after the Romans in this reſpect, may be traced in many other inſtances, which relate to the ancient cuſtoms and conſtitution of our country. Accordingly, he has cloſed his fifth chapter with obſervations upon this ſubject, in which he is the more diſpoſed to indulge himſelf, becauſe it has often been ſaid, that our Saxon anceſtors, as working upon firſt principles, and forming their plans of liberty and independence in the wilds of Germany, were the great originals of almoſt all the national cuſtoms that prevailed in England; that the feudal ſyſtem in particular was a Gothic ſtructure, an everlaſting monument of their military diſpoſition and civil polity; and, to raiſe its character ſtill higher, that, notwithſtanding the many burthenſome ſervices annexed to it, the true principles of liberty were interwoven in its very frame. In oppoſition to theſe ſentiments, Mr. Clarke has endeavoured to prove, that the feudal ſyſtem owes its original to the Romans, though the increaſe and progreſs of it muſt be entirely aſcribed to the Goths and Franks; that the Saxon witenagemot, like the Roman ſenate under the emperors, was an ariſtocratical aſſembly, formed on the property of the perſons, and the favour of the prince; and that the commons, as ſuch, had no ſhare in the Saxon legiſlature. This laſt point is particularly laboured by our Author, and he hath anſwered, at large, what has been advanced by Biſhop Ellys, on the contrary ſide of the queſtion. Some farther remarks are added upon the Engliſh conſtitution, in which a medium is preſerved between the opinion of Dr. Brady, who could not diſcover that the commons had any ſhare in the legiſlature before Edward the Firſt, and the opinion of Mr. Petyt, &c. &c. on the other hand, who are ſaid to have ſeen the commons in full poſſeſſion of this privilege many ages before it was in being. Beſides the writings we have already mentioned, Mr. Clarke joined with Mr. Bowyer in the tranſlation of Trapp's Lectures on Poetry, and was the author of ſeveral of the notes ſubjoined to the Engliſh verſion of Bleterie's Life of the Emperor Julian (l). He left behind him a conſiderable number of manuſcripts *, among which are ſome volumes of excellent ſermons, the publication of which, we are told, may hereafter be expected (m). By his only wife Anne, he had children, two of whom ſurvived him, Edward before mentioned, and a daughter, who reſides at Chicheſter, and inherits not only the virtues of her parents, but their paſſion for literature (n). Mr. Edward Clarke paid an honourable and affectionate tribute to his father's memory, in a Latin epitaph of a conſiderable length [B]. Hitherto we have been enabled to proceed chiefly from the aſſiſtance of the materials afforded us in Mr. Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer. In what farther occurs, we are ſolely indebted to the elegant pen of our great modern Poet, Mr. Hayley. This gentleman, whoſe genius is accompanied with every private virtue, was intimately acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Clarke; and upon our application to him for ſome information concerning them, obligingly ſuſpended his own important purſuits, to comply with our requeſt. Accordingly, he hath favoured us with the following characters of his two excellent friends, which we ſhall inſert exactly in his own words, and with which we are happy to conclude, and to adorn, the preſent article.

treated of, we ſhall not pretend abſolutely to determine; though we cannot but think, that the perſons who have embraced oppoſite ſchemes will ſtill find many reaſons to adhere to them.

The ſixth and laſt chapter of this very valuable and learned work, treats upon the Roman pound; and its chief deſign is to refute the calculations which have been made by Meſſrs. Eiſenſchmid and La Barre, and to confirm the eſtimate given by Mr. Greaves. The whole is concluded with Mr. Smyth's tables for computing the Roman money, corrected, enlarged, and reduced to a new form.

Mr. Edward Clarke reſided ſome time in Spain, as Chaplain to the Earl of Briſtol, the Engliſh Ambaſſador; and afterwards publiſhed, in Quarto, "Letters concerning the Spaniſh Nation," which contain much curious and uſeful intelligence relative to the ſtate of that country.

Mr. Nichols has related, that the Duke of Newcaſtle was once ſo angry with Mr. William Clarke, for offering to vote for Mr. Melliſh, the ſquire of the pariſh, as to abuſe him groſsly and forbid him his houſe (2). But we are aſſured, upon undoubted authority, that this ſtory is totally without foundation.

Mr.

" Mr. Clarke was not only a man of extenſive erudition, but he had the pleaſing " talent of communicating his various knowledge in familiar converſation, without any " appearance of pedantry or preſumption. There was an engaging mildneſs in his " countenance and manner, which brought to the remembrance of thoſe, who con- " verſed with him, the portrait of Eraſmus.—Indeed he bore a great reſemblance to " that celebrated perſonage in many particulars: in the delicacy of his conſtitution, in " the temperance of his life, in his paſſion for letters, in the modeſt pleaſantry of his " ſpirit, and in the warm and active benevolence of his heart. As men, they had both " their foibles, but foibles of ſo trivial a nature, that they are loſt in the radiance of " their beneficent virtues.

" Antiquities were the favourite ſtudy of Mr. Clarke, as his publications ſufficiently " ſhew: but he was a ſecret, and by no means an unſucceſsful votary of the Muſes. " He wrote Engliſh verſe with eaſe, elegance, and ſpirit. Perhaps there are few better " epigrams in our language than the following, which he compoſed on ſeeing the words " Domus ultima inſcribed on the vault belonging to the Dukes of Richmond in the " Cathedral of Chicheſter.

" Did he, who thus inſcrib'd the wall,
" Not read, or not believe St. Paul,
" Who ſays there is, where'er it ſtands,
' Another houſe not made with hands;'
" Or may we gather from theſe words,
" That houſe is not a houſe of Lords?

" Among the happier little pieces of his ſportive poetry, there were ſome animated " ſtanzas, deſcribing the character of the twelve Engliſh Poets, whoſe portraits, en- " graved by Vertue, were the favourite ornament of his parlour: but he ſet ſo modeſt " and humble a value on his poetical compoſitions, that I believe they were ſeldom " committed to paper, and are therefore very imperfectly preſerved in the memory of " thoſe, to whom he ſometimes recited them.

" His taſte and judgment in poetry appears, indeed, very ſtriking in many parts of " his learned and elaborate Connexion of Coins. His illuſtration of Neſtor's cup in par- " ticular, may be eſteemed as one of the happieſt examples of that light and beauty, " which the learning and ſpirit of an elegant Antiquarian may throw on a cloudy and " miſtaken paſſage of an antient Poet.

" He gave a very beneficial proof of his zeal for literature, by the trouble he took " in regulating the library of the Cathedral to which he belonged. He perſuaded " Biſhop Mawſon to beſtow a conſiderable ſum towards repairing the room appropri- " ated to this purpoſe. He obtained the donation of many valuable volumes from " different perſons; and by his conſtant and liberal attention to this favourite object, " raiſed an inconſiderable and neglected collection of books, into a very uſeful and re- " ſpectable public library.

" As to his talents as a Divine, he might, I think, be rather eſteemed as a ſenſible " and inſtructive, than as a highly eloquent Preacher. Though the general tone of " his voice was good, he knew not how to give it that harmonious and varied modu- " lation, which is one of the eſſential graces in perfect eloquence.—In the more im- " portant points of his profeſſional character, he was entitled to much higher praiſe. " —In ſtrict attention to all the duties of his ſtation, in the moſt active and unwearied " charity, he might be regarded as a model to the Miniſters of God.—Though his " income was never large, it was his cuſtom to devote a ſhilling in every guinea that he " received, to the ſervice of the poor.—As a maſter, as a huſband, and a father, his " conduct was amiable and endearing; and to cloſe this imperfect ſketch of him with " his moſt ſtriking feature, he was a man of genuine unaffected piety.

" Having thus given you a ſlight yet a faithful account of Mr. Clarke, let me now " ſpeak of the admirable woman, who was the dear companion of his life, and the af- " fectionate rival of his virtues. Mrs. Clarke inherited, from her father Wotton, the " retentive memory by which he was diſtinguiſhed; and ſhe poſſeſſed the qualities, in " which Swift conſidered him as remarkably deficient, penetration and wit. She " ſeemed, indeed, in theſe points, rather related to the laughter-loving Dean of St. " Patrick's, than to his ſolemn antagoniſt. The moral excellence of her character was " by no means inferior to the ſprightly activity of her mind. Nature and education " never formed, I believe, a more ſingular and engaging compound of good-humoured " vivacity and rational devotion. Her whole life ſeemed to be directed by the maxim, " which one of our Engliſh Biſhops adopted for his motto, ' Serve God, and be chearful.' " There was a degree of iraſcible quickneſs in her temper, but it was ſuch as gave ra- " ther an agreeable than a dangerous ſpirit to her general manners. Her anger was " never of long continuance, and uſually evaporated in a comic bon-mot, or in a pious " reflexion. She was perfectly acquainted with the works of our moſt celebrated Di-

" vines, and ſo familiar with the Engliſh Muſes, that even in the decline of her life, " when her recollection was impaired by age and infirmities, ſhe would frequently " quote, and with great happineſs of application, all our eminent Poets. She parti- " cularly delighted in the wit of Butler, and wrote herſelf a ſhort poem, which I am " unable to recover, in the manner of Hudibras.

" Her ſufferings on the death of her excellent huſband were extreme; and though " ſhe ſurvived him ſeveral years, it was in a broken and painful ſtate of health. " Through the courſe of a long life, and in the ſevere maladies which preceded her " diſſolution, ſhe diſplayed all the virtues of a Chriſtian with uniform perſeverance, but " without oſtentation.

" Such, my dear Sir, were the amiable perſons, of whom you wiſh me to ſpeak. " I have endeavoured to give you a very ſimple and true deſcription of two characters, " who being themſelves moſt ſteadily attached to ſimplicity and truth, would have been " wounded by the varniſh of leſs faithful and more elaborate praiſe: yet, as they were " both fond of verſe, I am tempted to add a little tribute of affectionate reſpect to " their memory, in the following Epitaph:

" Mild William Clarke, and Ann his wife,
" Whom happy love had join'd in life,
" United in an humble tomb,
" Await the everlaſting doom.
" And bleſt the dead! prepar'd as theſe,
" To meet their Saviour's juſt decrees!
" On earth their hearts were known to feel
" Such charity, and Chriſtian zeal,
" That ſhould the world for ages laſt,
" In adverſe fortune's bitter blaſt,
" Few friends ſo warm will man find here,
" And God no ſervants more ſincere *.] K.

* Mrs. Clarke was born in June 1700, and died on the 11th of July, 1783.

† For the principal materials of this article, we are indebted to the obliging information of the Rev. Thomas Campbell, LL.D. Chancellor of St. Macartin's, Clogher.

 [CLAYTON (ROBERT), † an excellent and learned Prelate of the kingdom of Ireland, was born at Dublin, in the year 1695. The family from which he was deſcended, were the Claytons of Fulwood in Lancaſhire, whoſe eſtate he became poſſeſſed of, by right of inheritance. His father, Dr. Clayton, was Miniſter of St. Michael's, Dublin, and Dean of Kildare; who, being deſirous that his ſon Robert ſhould receive the beſt claſſical education, ſent him to Weſtminſter ſchool; where, beſides enjoying the inſtructions of the able maſters of that ſchool, he was put under the private tuition of Zachary Pearce, then a King's ſcholar, and afterwards ſucceſſively Biſhop of Bangor and Rocheſter. From ſuch a connexion, Mr. Clayton could not avoid deriving particular advantage; and the two young gentlemen formed a mutual friendſhip, which was preſerved, by a regular correſpondence, to the end of their lives. From Weſtminſter ſchool Dr. Clayton removed his ſon to Trinity College Dublin, of which, in due time, he became a Fellow. Not ſatisfied with having received a merely ſcholaſtic education, he was deſirous of adding to it the benefits of foreign travel; and accordingly, made the tour of Italy and France. From whom Mr. Clayton received holy orders, what preferments he had before he was raiſed to the epiſcopacy, and when he took his degrees, we are not informed; only we find, that he was become Doctor of Divinity in 1729. In 1728, he entered into the matrimonial relation, which he was well able to do in the manner that was entirely agreeable to his own inclinations, by his having come into the poſſeſſion of an affluent eſtate, in conſequence of his father's deceaſe. Some time before his marriage, with a ſcrupuloſity very unuſual, he openly reſigned his Fellowſhip, without taking the leaſt meaſures to obtain in lieu of it any eccleſiaſtical benefice. The Lady he married was Catharine, daughter of Lord Chief Baron Donnellan. Her fortune, which was not conſiderable, he made a preſent of to her ſiſter. He behaved with the ſame generoſity to his own three ſiſters: for, not thinking the proviſion that had been made for them to be ſufficient for ſupporting the genteel ſtyle of life in which they had been educated, he gave to each of them as much more as had been bequeathed to them by their father's will. He has often been heard to relate, with pleaſantry, the pains which his father took to engage him to ſeek after a wife with a plentiful dowry. The old gentleman, in order to obtain his ſon's compliance, would argue, that a Lady's beſtowing upon him a large fortune, was the ſureſt teſtimony ſhe could exhibit of her ſincere and unfeigned affection. But our Doctor, whoſe mind was far raiſed above pecuniary conſiderations, was reſolved to follow the dictates of his own heart. He valued money only for the honourable uſe which might be made of it; and liberality and munificence conſtituted a prime part of his character. It was an extraordinary inſtance of this diſpoſition, which contributed towards his more ſpeedy advancement to the high rank which he ſuſtained in the Church.

Soon after Dr. Clayton's marriage, he went with his Lady to England, to paſs a winter in London. Whilſt he reſided in the metropolis, a perſon in diſtreſſed circumſtances applied to him for aſſiſtance, which he declined at firſt to contribute, from a ſuſpicion that there was ſome impoſture in the ſtory. But the petitioner appealing to the teſtimony of Dr. Samuel Clarke for a recommendation of the caſe, Dr. Clayton deſired to have a certificate under that gentleman's own hand. This, accordingly, was procured and preſented to Dr. Clayton; upon which, inſtead of the uſual donation on ſuch occaſions, he gave to the neceſſitous man no leſs a ſum than three hundred pounds, which was the whole that he wanted to make him eaſy in the world. An action of ſo uncommon a nature could not fail of introducing our Divine to the acquaintance of Dr. Clarke, which was followed by a mutual eſteem and friendſhip, and by a free diſcuſſion of theological ſubjects. The reſult of the converſations that paſſed between them, was Dr. Clayton's embracing thoſe religious principles to which he adhered during the remainder of his life. This he hath been heard frequently to declare to his friends.

Dr. Clarke carried to Queen Caroline an account of Dr. Clayton's remarkable beneficence, and it made a powerful impreſſion on her Majeſty's mind in favour of his character; which impreſſion was ſtrongly enforced by the good offices of Lady Sundon. This accompliſhed Lady, the favourite of the Queen, and the particular friend of Clarke and Hoadly, had been married to a Mr. Clayton, no very diſtant relation of our worthy Divine. Indeed, it is by her name of Mrs. Clayton, rather than that of Lady Sundon, that ſhe has been moſt known in the world. Such a powerful intereſt, in connexion with Dr. Clayton's perſonal merit, procured for him an immediate recommendation, from her Majeſty, to Lord Carteret, then Chief Governor of Ireland, for the very firſt biſhoprick that ſhould become vacant. An opportunity of this kind ſoon happened, by the tranſlation of Dr. Robert Howard, Biſhop of Killala, to the See of Elphin (a). It appears from Dr. Boulter's letters, at that time Primate of Ireland, that he was well acquainted with the deſign which was then formed in England for raiſing Dr. Clayton to the Prelacy. Nor does the Archbiſhop appear to have had any objection to this intention; only he would have preferred Dr. Clayton's being appointed to the Biſhoprick of Clonfert (b). He was, however, advanced to the epiſcopal Seat of Killala, in January, 1729-30. In this ſituation he continued till November, 1735, when he was tranſlated to the See of Cork, upon the death of Dr. Peter Brown. The Biſhoprick of Derry having become vacant ſome months before, the Primate Boulter was apprehenſive leſt Dr. Clayton ſhould immediately be removed thither from Killala. This did not ariſe from any diſlike which his Grace had to our Prelate, but from his being of opinion that ſo young a man, and ſo young a Biſhop, ought not to be promoted with ſuch rapidity to the richeſt See in the kingdom, as it would create great uneaſineſs to thoſe who had been longer ſeated on the Epiſcopal Bench. It appears, from two of the good Archbiſhop's Letters, that he was afraid of Mrs. Clayton's activity on this occaſion; from which it may be collected, that ſhe was a woman of intereſt and ſpirit, and probably of ambition. What the primate propoſed was, that Dr. Hort, Biſhop of Kilmore, ſhould be removed to Derry, and Dr. Clayton to Kilmore (c). This arrangement, however, did not take place. It was thought neceſſary for the public ſervice that the excellent Dr. Rundle, who had been unjuſtly and malignantly perſecuted in England, ſhould be promoted to the Biſhoprick of Derry; and the Government took the opportunity, which happened not long after, of advancing Dr. Clayton to the See of Cork, from which he was tranſlated to that of Clogher, in 1745 (d).

Hitherto we have ſeen little or nothing of our Prelate in his literary capacity; and it is remarkable, that he had been many years a Biſhop before he was at all known in the world as a man of eminent learning. It is certain, that he laid a good foundation of literature in early life, and his progreſs in it might be greater than was commonly apprehended; but this was a ſecret, at leaſt to his acquaintance in general. Being diſtinguiſhed for the politeneſs of his manners, converſing much with the ladies, and mixing frequently in public ſociety, the character of the ſcholar was loſt in that of the gentleman. It is indeed, probable, that his application to ſtudy grew more intenſe as he advanced in years; and he is mentioned as an inſtance (we preſume not to ſay that it is an uncommon one) of a man's having been rendered better by his exaltation to a Biſhoprick. So unfavourable an idea was entertained of his erudition, that when he publiſhed his firſt work it was not believed to be his own. But this prejudice, which aroſe from an ignorance of the valuable manner in which Dr. Clayton had ſpent his time, was ſoon removed; and the whole world became convinced of his ſolid, various, and extenſive learning (e). Excepting a letter written to the Royal Society, upon a ſubject of no great conſequence, his firſt publication was an "Introduction to the "Hiſtory of the Jews," which was afterwards tranſlated into French, and printed at Leyden. Not having ſeen this performance, we cannot aſcertain the year of its appearance. Our Prelate's next work was, "The Chronology of the Hebrew Bible vin-"dicated; the Facts compared with other ancient Hiſtories, and the Difficulties ex-"plained,

" plained, from the Flood to the Death of Moſes; together with ſome Conjectures in " Relation to Egypt, during that Period of Time; alſo two Maps, in which are at- " tempted to be ſettled the Journeyings of the Children of Iſrael." This elaborate production was printed in quarto, in 1747, and contains a variety of obſervations, which deſerve the attention of the learned reader. From the time of Uſher, the chronology of the Hebrew Bible has been generally adopted by the Divines of our own country. Of late, indeed, that of the Septuagint has been ably defended by Mr. Jackſon; and ſpeculative men will find abundant cauſe for doubt, with regard to a ſubject which will always be attended with difficulties that are not capable of being eaſily and fully explained. In 1749, Biſhop Clayton publiſhed a " Diſſertation on Prophecy;" in which he endeavoured to ſhew, from a joint compariſon of the Prophecies of Daniel, and the Revelations of St. John, that the final end of the diſperſion of the Jews will be coincident with the ruin of the Popedom, and take place about the year 2000. If in diſcuſſing matters of ſo diſputable a nature, our author ſhould be thought to have failed in preciſely eſtabliſhing the point he had in view, it may be remembered, that, if he has been miſtaken, he has only erred with many able men who have gone before him in the ſame walk of theological literature. The Diſſertation on Prophecy was followed by an " Impartial Enquiry into the Time of the Coming of the Meſſiah," in two letters to an eminent Jew, printed firſt ſeparately, and then together, in 1751. In theſe letters, and eſpecially in the ſecond of them, the Biſhop of Clogher diſplays himſelf to great advantage. The arguments are addreſſed ſolely to the Jews, to convince them of their error in rejecting the Meſſiahſhip of Jeſus; and the ſubject is treated of with true learning, candour, and judgment. In the ſame year (1751) appeared the " Eſſay on " Spirit;" a performance which excited a very general attention, which has not yet loſt its celebrity, and which was productive of a large and fruitful controverſy [A]. The whole

[A] Which was productive of a large and fruitful controverſy.] We ſhall here give a catalogue of the publications which were owing to the " Eſſay on Spirit," ſo far as we have been able to do it, either by our own perſonal knowledge of them, or by conſulting the volumes of the Monthly Review. 1. " A " Letter to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of " Clogher, occaſioned by his Lordſhip's Eſſay on " Spirit," 8vo. 1752. This letter does not oppoſe the general doctrine advanced in the eſſay, but finds fault with the metaphyſical garb in which it is cloathed, and is accompanied with a few ſtrictures on what had been advanced, in the dedication, relative to the neceſſity of ſubſcribing to ſome articles of Religion. 2. " A Diſſertation on the Scripture Expreſſions, the " Angel of the Lord, and the Angel of Jeſus Chriſt, " proving that the Word Angel is put to ſignify, on " theſe Occaſions, material Bodies, and not Spirit: " interſperſed with many other curious Obſervations " quite new; and containing a full Anſwer to a late " Eſſay on Spirit: which is calculated to ſet aſide " the Doctrine of the Trinity and Unity." 8vo. 1752. 3. " A Sequel to the Eſſay on Spirit: Being the Re- " ſult of a fair and ſerious Enquiry concerning a " very important Doctrine of the Chriſtian Religion, " as delivered in the ſacred Scriptures. With ſome " Obſervations relating to the Athanaſian and Nicene " Creeds. Addreſſed to his Grace the Lord Arch- " biſhop of Canterbury." 8vo. 1752. This tract, the deſign of which is to ſupport the principles maintained in the eſſay, is written with great candour and modeſty, and does not endeavour to determine the queſtion concerning the Trinity by having recourſe to any metaphyſical refinements, but by a ſober appeal to the plain declarations of the New Teſtament. The Author is well known to be a Clergyman of the Church of England of the moſt reſpectable character, who hath publiſhed various other pieces in Vindication of the Supremacy of the Father over the Son and the holy Spirit. The " Sequel" has gone through ſeveral editions, and is highly eſteemed by many Chriſtian Readers. 4. " The genuine Sequel to the " Eſſay on Spirit," 8vo. 1752. This was a kind of a burleſque performance, in which the humour was not ſuſtained with much ability. 5. " An effectual " and eaſy Demonſtration, from Principles purely " philoſophical, of the Truth of the ſacred, eternal, " coequal Trinity of the Godhead; and of the per- " fect Inextenſion of Matter in Space." By John Kirkby, Rector of Blackmanſtone in Kent, 8vo. 1752. 6. " A Defence of the Eſſay on Spirit; with Re- " marks on the ſeveral pretended Anſwers; and " which may ſerve as an Antidote againſt all that " ſhall ever appear againſt it," 8vo. 1752. 7. " A " plain and proper Anſwer to the Queſtion, Why " does not the Biſhop of Clogher, ſuppoſing him to " be Author of the Eſſay on Spirit, reſign his pre- " ferments? Wherein ſome Obſervations are made " on the Articles of the Liturgy. By a Friend to " the Eſtabliſhed Church," 8vo. 1753. This is a curious and ſenſible pamphlet, the deſign of which is to ſhew, that every Clergyman in the Church ſubſcribes to Doctrines which he neither does nor can believe; and, therefore, that it muſt appear ridiculous for one Clergyman to object to another upon the buſineſs of ſubſcription. 8. " A ſecond Letter to " the Right Rev. the Lord Biſhop of Clogher, in " Ireland: being an Anſwer to the Defence of the " Eſſay on Spirit, ſo far as it relates to the Author " of the firſt Letter," 8vo. 1753. 9. " An Anſwer " to the Eſſay on Spirit, wherein is ſhewn, that the " Author's Interpretation of Scripture is imperfect, " and his Repreſentation of the Opinions of the " ancient Fathers unfair." By Thomas Knowles, M. A. Chaplain to the Right Hon. the Lady Harvey, 8vo. 1753. 10. " A full Anſwer to the Eſſay on " Spirit; wherein all the Author's Objections, both " ſcriptural and philoſophical, to the Doctrine of the " Trinity; his Opinions relating to the Uniformity " of the Church; his Criticiſms upon the Anathaſian " and Nicene Creeds, &c. are examined and con- " futed: with a particular Explanation of the Her- " metic, Pythagorean, and Platonic Trinities: and " a Preface giving ſome Account of an Author who " hath lately publiſhed in Defence of the Eſſay," 8vo. 1753. The writer of this tract, the Rev. Mr. William Jones, hath appeared ſince, upon various occaſions, as a zealous advocate for the Trinity; and hath diſtinguiſhed himſelf, likewiſe, by ſeveral other publications. 11. " Some Thoughts on Self-Love, " innate Ideas, Free-Will, Taſte, Sentiment, Liberty, " and Neceſſity, &c. occaſioned by reading Mr. " Hume's Works, and the ſhort Treatiſe written in " French by Lord Bolingbroke, on Compaſſion; to- " gether with a few Remarks on the genuine Sequel, " and Mr. Knowles's Anſwer to the Eſſay on Spirit. " In a Letter to a Friend. By the Author of the " Eſſay on Spirit," 8vo. 1753. The ingenious and learned writer here diſplays the ſame acuteneſs which he had diſplayed in his former performance, and ſhews himſelf to be not unequal to a diſpute with his antagoniſts. 12. " The Negative on that Queſtion, " Whether is the Arch-angel Michael our Saviour? " examined and defended. An Argument deſigned whole title of the book is, " An Eſſay on Spirit, wherein the Doctrine of the Trinity " is conſidered in the Light of Reaſon and Nature, as well as in the Light in which it " was held by the ancient Hebrews, compared alſo with the Doctrine of the Old and " New Teſtament; with an Enquiry into the Sentiments of the primitive Fathers of " the Church, and the Doctrine of the Trinity, as maintained by the Egyptians, Py- " thagoreans, and Platoniſts; together with ſome Remarks on the Athanaſian and Ni- " cene Creeds," 8vo. It is plain, from this long title page, that the work abounds with various diſcuſſion; and, indeed, the author hath given free ſcope to his ſpeculations. Beginning with a ſeries of metaphyſical obſervations, he riſes, by degrees, to his principal object, which is to aſſert the inferiority of the Son, and of the Spirit, to the Father; and this point he hath ſuſtained with ſingular ingenuity, and with no ſmall degree of ability. We think, at the ſame time, that he hath indulged too freely to imagination and conjecture; and that he might have confined the queſtion, with greater advantage, to the direct and ſimple ſtandard of Scripture. In the dedication of the work to Dr. George Stone, then Lord Primate of Ireland, the matter of ſubſcription is conſidered; and it is contended, that the Articles of Religion are only required to be ſubſcribed as Articles of Peace. What the writer has advanced upon this head hath had ſome proper ſtrictures made upon it by the acute and learned author of the Confeſſional (f). But though our eſſayiſt was for admitting ſubſcription with a certain latitude, he thought that the doctrines impoſed ought to be as plain, few, and fundamental as poſſible; and he ardently wiſhed for ſome degree of reformation in the Church, and eſpecially for the abolition of the Athanaſian Creed.

(f) Confeſſional, p. 246—258. Third edition.

It is a remarkable fact, and hitherto not known in the world, that the Eſſay on Spirit was not actually written by the Biſhop of Clogher. The real author of it was a young Clergyman in our Prelate's dioceſe, who ſhewed the manuſcript to his Lordſhip, and, for reaſons which may eaſily be conceived, expreſſed his fear of venturing to print it in his own name. The Biſhop, with that romantic generoſity which marked his character, readily took the matter upon himſelf; and determined to ſuſtain all the obloquy that might ariſe from the publication. He did not, indeed, abſolutely avow the work, nor could he do it with truth: but by letting it paſs from his hands to the preſs, and covering it with the dedication, which was of his own writing, he managed the affair in ſuch a manner, that the treatiſe was univerſally aſcribed to him; and it was openly conſidered as his, in all the attacks to which it was expoſed. Few perſons, excepting Dr. Barnard, the preſent Dean of Derry, knew the fact to be otherwiſe; and he hath authorized Dr.

" to prove the real humanity of Chriſt. To which " are annexed, Obſervations for illuſtrating the " Doctrine of thoſe appearances under the Old Teſ- " tament, which are generally termed angelical: to- " gether with a full Interpretation of ſuch of thoſe " Narratives as are particularly referred to by the " Author of the Eſſay on Spirit. In a Letter to the " Right Rev. the Lord Biſhop of Clogher." By Sayer Rudd, M. D. Miniſter of Walmer, in Kent, 8vo, 1753. 13. A Vindication of the Doctrine of " the Trinity, from the Exceptions of a late Pam- " phlet, entitled, an Eſſay on Spirit, &c. By a " Divine of the Church of England." In two parts, 8vo. 1753. 14. " The holy ſcriptural Doctrines of " the divine Trinity in eſſential Unity, and of the " Godhead of Jeſus Chriſt being one and the ſame " with his Father's, ſhewn to be not only wholly ſcrip- " tural, but demonſtrative, and moſt clearly conceiv- " able Truths. Wherewith is occaſionally ſhewn, " that the Newtonian Philoſophy, although formally " and mathematically true, however is materially and " phyſically falſe. To which is prefixed, a prefatory " Diſcourſe, wherein the phyſical and metaphyſical, " and theological Errors of a late Treatiſe, entitled, " An Eſſay on Spirit, are clearly ſet forth and con- " futed." By John Scott, D. D. 1754. 15. " A " moral Diſcourſe on the Attributes of God; or a " ſhort Review of the Chriſtian Religion, on the " Principles of Reaſon. By a Layman. Occaſioned " by a ſmall Book, entitled, An Eſſay on Spirit," 8vo. 1754. 16. " The Doctrine of the Trinity, as " uſually explained, inconſiſtent with Scripture and " Reaſon; and the pernicious Conſequences, that " attend ſuch Miſrepreſentations of Chriſtianity, ſet " forth. In a Letter to the Author of the late Vin- " dication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, in two " Parts," 8vo. 1754. 17. " A Vindication of the " Doctrine of the Trinity from the Exceptions of a " late Pamphlet, entitled, an Eſſay on Spirit. Alſo " an Appendix, containing ſome Remarks on the " Dedication prefixed to the Eſſay," 8vo. 1754. The three parts of this Vindication, and the Appendix, were written by the late Dr. Randolph, of Oxford. 18. " An Eſſay towards an Anſwer to a Book, enti- " tled, an Eſſay on Spirit." By the Rev. Thomas M'Donnel, D. D. 12mo. Dublin, 1754. This was followed by a ſhort vindication, by the ſame author, in anſwer to ſome ſtrictures that were made upon him. 19. " The Doctrine of the ever-bleſſed Trinity proved, " in a Diſcourſe on the 18th Chapter of Geneſis." By George Watſon, M. A. 8vo. 1756. 20. " A ſin- " cere Chriſtian's Anſwer to the Appeal to the com- " mon Senſe of all Chriſtian People, concerning an " important Point of Doctrine, impoſed upon their " Conſciences, by the Authority of Church-Go- " vernment; and in particular to the Members of " the Church of England. In a Letter to the Ap- " pellant. Together with a Preface, wherein, occa- " ſionally, the Cenſures of the Authors of the " Monthly Review, upon the Eſſay towards an An- " ſwer to the Eſſay on Spirit, written by the Author " of this Anſwer, are examined, and obviated." By the Rev. Thomas M'Donnel, D. D. 8vo. 1756. In reflecting upon this controverſy, to which, when it was carried on, we paid a conſiderable degree of attention, we find reaſon to obſerve, that it did not exhibit that diſplay of great talents and literature which appeared in the controverſy occaſioned by Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity. The only able and formidable antagoniſt of the author of the Eſſay on Spirit, ſeems to have been Dr. Randolph. The reſt of the eſſayiſt's opponents, by the bigotry of their temper, by making uſe of ſome arguments apparently weak, and by urging others manifeſtly foreign to the purpoſe, contributed but little to the ſupport of the cauſe in which they engaged. Upon the whole, the Eſſay on Spirit, and the tracts on the ſame ſide of the queſtion, were the means of diffuſing the Arian opinions; which opinions, however, are, at preſent, upon the decline; many unitarian Chriſtians tending faſt to the doctrine of Socinus.

Thomas

Thomas Campbell to aſſure the public, that the Biſhop of Clogher was only the adopted father of the "Eſſay on Spirit." One effect of our Prelate's conduct in this matter was, his being prevented from riſing to a higher ſeat in the Church. In 1752, upon the death of Dr. Hort; he was recommended, by the Duke of Dorſet; then Viceroy of Ireland, to the vacant Archbiſhoprick of Tuam. But a negative was put upon him in England, ſolely on account of his being regarded as the writer of the eſſay.

The next appearance of Dr. Clayton from the preſs, was in a work undoubtedly his own; and that was his "Vindication of the Hiſtories of the Old and New Teſtament; "in Anſwer to the Objections of the late Lord Bolingbroke; in two Letters to a young "Nobleman," 8vo. 1752. This was only the firſt part of his deſign, and it is executed with great ability. The miſtakes, in particular, to which Lord Bolingbroke's objections to ſeveral parts of ſcripture were owing, are well expoſed and confuted. In 1753, the Biſhop of Clogher publiſhed "A Journal from Grand Cairo to Mount Sinai, and "back again. Tranſlated from a Manuſcript, written by the Prefetto of Egypt, in "Company with the Miſſionaries de propaganda Fide at Grand Cairo. To which are "added, ſome Remarks on the Origin of Hieroglyphics and the Mythology of the "ancient Heathens." Dedicated to the Society of Antiquaries, London, 4to. An edition was likewiſe printed in octavo. The Biſhop, having become poſſeſſed of the original Journal from Grand Cairo to Mount Sinai, and which had been mentioned by Dr. Pococke in his Travels through the Eaſt, communicated this tranſlation of it to the Society of Antiquaries, with a view of exciting them to make ſome enquiry into certain ancient characters, which, as appears from the Journal, are diſcovered in great numbers in the wilderneſs of Sinai, at a place well known by the name of Gebel el Mokatab, or the written Mountains. By carefully copying a good quantity of theſe letters, his Lordſhip apprehended that the ancient Hebrew character, which is now loſt, might be recovered; and he was of opinion, that if a perſon were ſent on purpoſe to live for ſome time at Tor, on the coaſt of the Red Sea, he might make ſuch an acquaintance with the Arabs living near the written Mountains, by the civility of his behaviour, and frequently making them ſmall preſents, that it would be no great difficulty, in ſix months, or thereabouts, to attain the deſired end. As this would require a good capacity in the perſon employed, and be attended, likewiſe, with conſiderable expence, Dr. Clayton thought proper to apply to the Society above-mentioned, to look out for ſome man of ſuch education and character as well qualified him for the undertaking. The Biſhop, at the ſame time, offered to bear any proportion of the expence the Society ſhould think fit, in order to have the deſign thoroughly effected (g). The ſum which he propoſed to give, agreeably to the cuſtomary generoſity of his temper, was a hundred pounds a year, for five years (b). Beſides procuring a copy of the unknown characters to be found on the mountains of Mokatab, our Prelate had another object in view, which was, to have a particular deſcription of the ſecond ſtone ſtruck by Moſes, as mentioned in the twentieth chapter of Numbers. Of this ſtone, which has lain unnoticed by any traveller of conſequence for ſo many thouſand years, mention is made in the Journal from Cairo; and it was looked upon by his Lordſhip as an atteſtation of the truth of the Moſaical Hiſtory written by the finger of God. For this reaſon, independently of all curioſity, the Biſhop thought it would be worth while to employ ſome perſon to go thither, who ſhould be very exact in his deſcription of it (i). It doth not appear, that any meaſures were taken by the Society of Antiquaries, in conſequence of theſe propoſitions. However, what Dr. Clayton had publiſhed excited the attention of ſucceeding travellers. The celebrated Mr. Edward Wortley Montagu, in particular, made a journey from Cairo to the Deſart of Sinai, with the expreſs purpoſe of ſeeing and deſcribing the objects propoſed by the Biſhop. With regard to the written mountains, the reſult of his enquiry was not agreeable to the expectations which our good Prelate had formed upon the ſubject. On examining the characters, Mr. Montagu was greatly diſappointed, in finding them every where interſperſed with figures of men and beaſts, which convinced him that they were not written by the Iſraelites. It will be difficult, he ſays, to gueſs what the inſcriptions were; and he expreſſes his fear, that if ever it ſhould be diſcovered what they contain, nothing important would be the effect of the diſcovery (k). If our recollection doth not fail us, the reſearches of more recent travellers have been equally unſucceſsful.

In 1754, the Biſhop of Clogher favoured the literary world with the ſecond part of his "Vindication of the Hiſtories of the Old and New Teſtament. Wherein the Mo-"ſaical Hiſtory of the Creation and Deluge is philoſophically explained; the Errors "of the preſent Theory of the Tides detected and rectified: Together with ſome Re-"marks on the Plurality of Worlds. ſingular ingenuity: but that his judgment is equal to his ingenuity, we dare not take upon ourſelves abſolutely to aſſert. Dr. Clayton's account of the formation of the earth and of the deluge, was attacked by Mr. Alexander Catcott, a gentleman of the Hutchinſonian principles, but of greater learning and candour than uſually have appeared in the advocates for Mr. Hutchinſon's method of explaining the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament. Our Prelate's next publication was in 1755, and conſiſted only of ſome letters which had paſſed between his Lordſhip, when Biſhop of Cork, and Mr. William Penn, on the ſubject of baptiſm. The point in debate was, What is the Baptiſm of Chriſt, and wherein does it conſiſt? Mr. Penn urged the arguments of Mr. Barclay, to ſhew that the baptiſm of the Spirit is the ſame with the true Chriſtian baptiſm commanded by our Saviour, Matthew xxviii. 19. Our author contended, on the other hand, that the true Chriſtian baptiſm is to continue to the end of the world; whereas the baptiſm of the Holy Ghoſt has not continued, but ceaſed with the ceaſing of miracles (l).

We come now to an event of great conſequence in the Biſhop of Clogher's life. He had long been diſſatisfied with the Athanaſian Creed, nor did he approve of the Nicene Creed in every particular; on which accounts he was not a little diſturbed, that they continued to be a part of the Liturgy of the Church. Theſe ſentiments he had declared in his writings; but this, upon mature deliberation, did not appear to him to be a ſufficient diſcharge of his Chriſtian duty. He determined, therefore, to avow the ſame ſentiments in his legiſlative capacity; and accordingly, on Monday, the 2d of February, 1756, he propoſed, in the Iriſh Houſe of Lords, that the Nicene and Athanaſian Creeds ſhould, for the future, be left out of the Liturgy of the Church of Ireland. The ſpeech which our Prelate delivered upon this intereſting occaſion, being the Biſhop's manner of thinking, we ſhall inſert what he hath ſaid concerning the peopling of America.

" As to the peopling of America, I am fully of " opinion with Biſhop Stillingfleet, Dr. Burnet, and " Mr. Whiſton, that it is no impeachment of the ve- " racity of the Sacred Hiſtory, to ſuppoſe the con- " tinent of America to have been ſeparated from that " of Europe, when the fountains of the great deep " were broken up, at the time of the deluge; in " which ſome few of its inhabitants, with the birds " and beaſts peculiar to that country, were, by the " will of God, ſaved from the general deſtruction, " for the continuance of the ſeveral ſpecies upon earth. " But, that the Sacred Hiſtorian takes no notice of " it, any more than he does of what became of Noah " and the progeny that was born to him after the " flood, during the time that he lived afterwards " upon the earth, which was three hundred and fifty " years; in which long ſpace of time, it is not to be " ſuppoſed, that he and his wife, who was left alive " with him, ſhould have no children; but Moſes " does not take any notice of it, becauſe the menti- " oning of this was not neceſſary to the general de- " ſign of this Hiſtory. Which ſeems to have been " firſt, to eſtabliſh the belief of one God, Creator of " heaven and earth; then to give us an account of " the fall of man, and of the ſubſequent gracious " promiſe made to Adam, that the ſeed of the woman " ſhould bruiſe the head of that ſpirit, who, under " the guiſe of a ſerpent, had contributed to his fall. " In which promiſe it is agreed, both by Jewiſh and " Chriſtian Divines, that the promiſe of a Redeemer " under the character of the Meſſiah, was metapho- " rically included. And therefore, the ſubſequent " purport of the writings of Moſes in the book of " Geneſis, is principally calculated to trace out the " birth of the Meſſiah from Eve, through Noah and " Abraham to his own times.

" And accordingly, as ſoon as he hath conducted " Noah ſafe out of the ark, and brought his three " ſons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, into the plains of " Shinar, and diſperſed them from thence over the " weſtern world, he ſays nothing about the progeny " of Ham, or Japhet, any more than he does of " Noah; but confines his hiſtory entirely to the poſ- " terity of Shem, from whence the Meſſiah was to be " lineally deſcended.

" And, whereas, it is ſaid by Moſes, when ſpeak- " ing of the deluge, that all fleſh died that moved " upon the earth, both of fowl and of cattle, and of " beaſts, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon " the earth, and every man. All in whoſe noſtrils was " the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land " died. And every living ſubſtance was deſtroyed, that " was upon the face of the ground, both man and cattle, " and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven, " and they were deſtroyed from the earth; and Noah " only remained alive, and they that were with him in " the ark; it is manifeſt, from what hath been al- " ready ſaid, concerning the expreſſion made uſe of " by Moſes, Gen. viii. 9. where he ſays, for the wa- " ters were on the face of THE WHOLE EARTH, that " theſe words are not always to be ſtrictly and lite- " rally interpreted, according to the exact meaning " of the letter: but that great allowances are to be " made for the elevated language of the Eaſtern na- " tions, who indulged themſelves in a warmer ſtyle, " and greater latitude of expreſſion than is generally " practiſed in theſe more temperate regions. They " therefore frequently put the whole for the greateſt " part; as for example, where it is ſaid, that who- " ſoever ſhall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one " point, he is guilty of all; ſince it is impoſſible for " him who keepeth the whole law, to offend in one " point: and ſo in numberleſs other places.—

" And therefore, although I look upon that part " of this narration, relating to the deſtruction of " mankind, and of birds, and of beaſts, at the deluge, " to be literally true, in reſpect only of that part of " the world, in which Noah lived before the flood, " and which was afterwards peopled by his three " ſons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet; yet I cannot but " acknowledge, that this deluge, which happened at " the time of Noah, muſt have been general in ſome " degree; as manifeſtly appears from the general ele- " vation of mountains over the whole world, and " from the immenſe quantity of ſea-ſhells, which " are frequently found in the moſt diſtant regions of " the earth. Nevertheleſs, I cannot but ſuppoſe, " that other parts of the then habitable world, which, " by the force of the deluge, were ſeparated into " iſlands, and were divided from the continent " whereon the ark landed, were in ſome ſort ex- " empted from the common calamity, brought upon " the reſt of the world by the deluge; inaſmuch as " the continent of America, and many iſlands in the " Eaſt-Indies, are at preſent partly inhabited by wild " beaſts, and noxious animals, which, it is not rea- " ſonable to imagine, that any body could or would, " have imported thither ſince that time. Therefore " I own, I cannot ſee any other probable ſolution of " this difficulty, than to ſuppoſe them protected by " the providence of God from the general deſtruc- " tion, in ſome extraordinary manner, for the propa- " gation of their own ſpecies (1)."

taken down in ſhort-hand, was afterwards publiſhed [C], and hath gone through ſeveral editions. When the Biſhop returned from the Houſe of Peers, he expreſſed to a gentleman,

[C] The ſpeech, &c. was afterwards publiſhed.] To give an extract or two from it, will, perhaps, not be diſagreeable to our readers. Part of what the Biſhop ſaid concerning the Nicene Creed is as follows, and will be found to contain ſentiments well worthy of a ſerious conſideration.

" The great Lord Bacon, in his excellent treatiſe " on the Advancement of Learning, a work that can- " not ſufficiently be praiſed, and to which Mr. Boyle, " Mr. Locke, and the great Sir Iſaac Newton, owe " the firſt rudiments of the ſeveral ſyſtems which they " have ſince carried to ſo great perfection: in this " wonderful treatiſe, wherein Lord Bacon is ſhewing " the deficiency of each ſpecies of learning, and is " pointing out the errors which have prevented the " progreſs and advancement of it, the ſcience of " Theology comes, among others, under his conſi- " deration, upon which he has this remark, which " for fear of being miſtaken in the quotation, I have " written down, and ſhall beg leave to read to your " Lordſhips. ' Here, therefore, I note this defici- " ency, that there hath not been, to my underſtand- " ing, ſufficiently enquired and handled, the true li- " mits and uſe of reaſon in ſpiritual things, as a kind " of divine dialect; which for that it is not done it " ſeemeth to me a thing uſual, by pretext of true " conceiving that which is revealed, to ſearch and " mine into that which is not revealed.' You have " now heard, my Lords, the ſentiment of this great " man, which is, that the ſearching and mining into " things not revealed, under pretence of their being " contained in that which is revealed, is the error " which he notes in the advancement of Theology. " Accordingly, if we enquire into the event and con- " ſequence of the afore-mentioned determination in " the Council of Nice, we ſhall find, that the courſe " of religion was thereby diverted into a wrong chan- " nel; and that Chriſtianity from thenceforward, " inſtead of being conſidered as a practical obligation, " was changed into a ſpeculative ſcience: mens " minds were irritated againſt one another, on ac- " count of niceties that were of no conſequence to " religion; and the doctrine of faith, or of belief in " punctilios of this kind, was ſo magnified and ex- " tolled, as being neceſſary to ſalvation, that the " righteouſneſs of works was entirely neglected. " Polemical Divinity was introduced into religion, " whereby the Church was rendered, if I may be al- " lowed the expreſſion, literally militant, and the di- " vine precept of univerſal love, which our Saviour " recommended to his Diſciples, as his command, " was changed into that of hatred to all who would " not ſubſcribe."

Of Athanaſius, and of the Creed which goes under his name, our conſcientious Prelate thus ſpeaks:

" As to the Athanaſian Creed, as that is a ſuper- " ſtructure built upon the foundation of the Nicene " Creed, it is not only liable to all the objections, " which can be made againſt that, but has alſo many " blemiſhes of its own to anſwer for; ſince it has " not ſo much as the authority of a Council to ſup- " port it, but is now a known forgery, detected by " the criticiſms of the learned Voſſius, and cannot " be traced within two hundred years of the time of " Athanaſius.

" But, then it may probably be aſked, how comes " it to bear the name of Athanaſius? The anſwer to " which is, becauſe it agrees perfectly with the Atha- " naſian doctrine; and had the name of Athanaſius " affixed to it by the church of Rome, becauſe he " was a perſon much eſteemed by that Church; and " whoſe principles, as well political as religious, " the members of that Church have long laboured " to propagate among mankind. But, as the true " character of this Athanaſius is not commonly " known; and therefore, ſome of your Lordſhips may " poſſibly be unacquainted with it, I ſhall beg leave " to inform you who, and what he was.

" Athanaſius was a young, forward, petulant " Deacon in the Church of Alexandria, of an am- " bitious ſpirit, with a talent fitted for diſputation. " And as he could have no hopes of getting into that " Biſhoprick, unleſs he could drive Arius out of " Alexandria, who was the principal Preſbyter in " that Church next to the Biſhop; this he effected, " by fomenting this diſpute about the Trinity, be- " tween Arius and the Biſhop; on which account, " having got Arius excommunicated, he had him " then baniſhed out of Alexandria. Which, when " done, no ſooner was the old Biſhop Alexander dead, " but Athanaſius, though then only a young man, " of about twenty-ſeven or twenty-eight years of " age, by the aſſiſtance of a ſet of murdering Aſce- " tics, forced himſelf at once into that high Arch- " biſhoprick, without ever paſſing through any of the " intermediate degrees. And, having gotten him- " ſelf illegally conſecrated, contrary to all the rules " and canons of the Church, he prevailed on the " Emperor Conſtantine to confirm him therein, by " the power of bribes, that were given to one of the " Emperor's favourites. And no ſooner was he tho- " roughly eſtabliſhed in it, but he immediately flew " in the Emperor's face. And when the Emperor " Conſtantine the Great was dead, treated his ſon " and ſucceſſor Conſtantius, with more contempt and " inſolence than could have been borne from an " equal. And when he was diſpoſſeſſed of his Biſhop- " rick for other irregularities, by a numerous " Council of Biſhops, regularly ſummoned and aſ- " ſembled, he forced his way into that See again, " more than once or twice, over the murdered corpſes " of his antagoniſts; and waded into his cathedral " through ſeas of blood.

" But it may, perhaps, be farther aſked, Why " ſhould this recommend him to the See of Rome? " The reaſon of which is, becauſe this was all done " by the connivance, and with the concurrence of " that See: Athanaſius, while he treated all the reſt " of mankind, and even his own royal maſter, with " the utmoſt inſolence, having paid a ſervile court to " the papal Chair. Inſomuch, that in the books of " the canon-law, the firſt precedent that is, or can " be produced, in ſupport of the papal Supremacy, " is this inſtance of the ſervile ſubmiſſion that was " paid by Athanaſius to Pope Julius. And there- " fore, I ſhould apprehend, that all Proteſtants, who " have renounced the Supremacy of the Pope, and " the independency of the Church upon the State, " ought to be for obliterating the name of Athana- " ſius out of their Liturgy, into which it was proba- " bly inſerted, only with a view of recommending " his political principles, under the ſhelter and influ- " ence of his religious doctrines.—

" My Lords, I deſire you will be ſo good as to ob- " ſerve, that I have not taken upon me to ſay, that " the doctrine contained in the Athanaſian Creed is " falſe; I only ſay, it is not plainly and clearly re- " vealed. Nor do I preſume to condemn thoſe, " who think they have evidence ſufficient to juſtify " their being peremptory, and poſitive, in the ſup- " port of it. I judge no man; and only ſay, it " contains a doctrine of ſo nice, ſo diſputable, and ſo " metaphyſical a nature, as is hardly fit to be treated " on in the ſchools; but is, I am certain, by no means " ſufficiently revealed to be made the ſubject of a " Creed, which is commanded, by public authority, " to be read by the Miniſter, and repeated by the " people, in the public ſervice of the Church, where " the low, as well as the high, are ordered to aſ- " ſemble themſelves; and which ſhould be, accord- " ing to St. Paul, not to doubtful diſputations, " but that they may, with one mind, and one mouth, " glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus " Chriſt.

" But, my Lords, let us now, on the contrary, " only for argument's ſake, ſuppoſe, that the doc- " trine contained in the Athanaſian Creed is wrong; " and, unleſs the author of it was infallible, there is " a poſſibility that it may be ſo; and then let us con- " ſider what would be the conſequence——I dread tleman, who accompanied him in his coach, his entirē ſatisfaction with what he had done. He ſaid, that his mind was eaſed of a load which had long lain upon it; and that he now enjoyed a heart-felt pleaſure, to which he had been a ſtranger for above twenty years before.

Whatever happineſs the Biſhop of Clogher might derive from thus complying with the dictates of his own conſcience, he had not the additional felicity of obtaining the approbation of his auditors. His ſpeech gave great and general offence, and was particularly diſguſting to the eccleſiaſtical Lords. The Primate ſaid, that it made his ears tingle. But, though ſo declared and avowed an attack upon the eſtabliſhment was regarded in a very atrocious light, no meaſures were taken for calling Dr. Clayton to an account for it, till he had publiſhed the third part of his "Vindication of the Hiſtories "of the Old and New Teſtament." In this part, which did not appear till the year 1757, he purſued his ſpeculations with as much freedom and ardour as ever. The nature of angels, and the ſcriptural account of the fall and redemption of mankind, were the objects of his particular examination; beſides which, he renewed his attacks upon the Trinity, and contended earneſtly for the utmoſt freedom of enquiry in matters of religion. In ſhort, he gave up ſo many doctrines as indefenſible, and advanced others ſo contradictory to the thirty-nine Articles, that the governors of the Church of Ireland determined to proceed againſt him; and in conſequence of this determination, his late Majeſty, King George the Second, was adviſed to order the Lord-Lieutenant of the kingdom, then the Duke of Bedford, to take the proper ſteps toward a legal proſecution of the Biſhop of Clogher. A day was accordingly fixed for a general meeting of the Iriſh Prelates at the houſe of the Primate, to which Dr. Clayton was ſummoned, that he might receive from them the notification of their intentions. A cenſure was certain; a deprivation was apprehended. But, before the time appointed arrived, he was ſeized with a nervous fever, which brought him to his diſſolution, on the 26th of February, 1758. It is on all hands agreed, that the agitation of mind, into which the Biſhop was thrown by the proſecution commenced againſt him, was the immediate cauſe of his death. We have been informed, that nothing affected him ſo much as the conſideration that he ſhould, on this occaſion, be forſaken by his royal Maſter. It does, indeed, reflect diſgrace on the memory of King George the Second, that he ſhould thus have been prevailed upon to give countenance to any meaſures of perſecution. Had Queen Caroline been living, ſhe would undoubtedly have protected the Prelate of her own creation; and who, ſuppoſing him to have been miſtaken in ſome of his opinions, was, nevertheleſs, diſtinguiſhed above ſeveral of his brethren on the Epiſcopal Bench, both by his abilities and his virtues. He was far ſuperior, in theſe reſpects, to the Primate, Dr. George Stone; who, whatever political talents he might poſſeſs, will not be tranſmitted to poſterity, with any extraordinary luſtre, in the hiſtory of religion and learning.

The perſon of Biſhop Clayton was not above the middle ſize; but his aſpect was commanding, and his countenance extremely pleaſing. His hair was dark, his eyes of the ſame colour, and though large they were piercing. His complexion was clear, and all his features in ſymmetry. The lineaments of his mind were not leſs fairly drawn. In private life he was much eſteemed, his manners being polite and chearful, his accompliſhments high and finiſhed, his addreſs open and engaging. He happily united the dignity of the great Eccleſiaſtic with the eaſe of the fine Gentleman. His elocution was diſtinct and ready, his preaching frequent, and, as it ought to be, plain and practical. The objects of his charity were uncommonly numerous, the ſums beſtowed by him large; and, in the true ſpirit of chriſtianity, they were given with ſuch privacy, that his beneficiaries ſeldom ſaw the hand by which they were relieved. A peculiar elegance diffuſed itſelf through every department of his domeſtic œconomy. His table was ſuch as became his rank; but, in the enjoyments of it, the Biſhop himſelf was ſingularly temperate. His favourite amuſement was angling, in which he was a great proficient. Though he lived much in ſociety, he found ſufficient time for ſtudy, by always riſing at five o'clock in the morning, both in ſummer and winter. By the union of temperance and exerciſe, he preſerved an uncommon ſhare of health till the 64th year of his age; and, from the goodneſs of his conſtitution, a far longer duration of life might have been hoped for, had not the preternatural agitation of ſpirits abovementioned, thrown him into the acute diſorder of which he died (m).

On Dr. Clayton's literary abilities and character, after what has been already ſaid, it is not neceſſary to enlarge. It is apparent, from his writings, that he was a man of a great

(m) In this pleaſing delineation of the Biſhop's private manners, we have almoſt entirely confined ourſelves to the exact words of Dr. T. Campbell.

"to name it; as it would be no leſs than blaſphemy "——For, if the Father, and the Son, have not "from all eternity been conſubſtantial, and co-equal, "the aſſertion of that propoſition would be blaſ- "phemy.

"My Lords, I will own freely to your Lordſhips, "that it is the dread and terror of a wrong determination, in a point of ſo delicate a nature, that "makes me ſolicitous for having this Creed removed "out of our Liturgy. In a matter of ſuch great "conſequence, and where the honour of God the Father is ſo nearly concerned, I own, that I am fearful how I put any other Being, or Perſon, upon a "level with him."

great capacity, of a vigorous imagination, and of extenſive learning. The accuracy of his judgment does not ſeem to have been equal to his other qualities. From the livelineſs of his fancy, he was ſometimes carried, perhaps too boldly, into the regions of conjecture: but theſe occaſional faults were amply compenſated for, by the liberal views of things, the general good ſenſe, and the variety of uſeful information with which his works abound. The very learned Mr. Markland, in one of his letters to Mr. Bowyer, ſays, "I thank you for the Biſhop of Clogher, who I think was a great man (n)."

(n) Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 448.

Our Prelate left behind him ſeveral works in manuſcript, which are now in the poſſeſſion of his executor, Dr. Barnard, Dean of Derry. This gentleman is of opinion, that they would do no diſhonour to the Biſhop; but perſonal regard to the deceaſed, and a tenderneſs to his memory, which the Dean thinks has already ſuffered ſufficiently for what was publiſhed in his life-time, have hitherto induced him to ſuppreſs them, leſt they ſhould again revive a ſubject, which were better buried in oblivion. Such is Dr. Barnard's view of the matter; while other perſons may, perhaps, be diſpoſed to entertain a different ſentiment. It is impoſſible to prevent the Trinitarian controverſy from being perpetually renewed; but it is probable that, in the preſent ſtate of it, the publication of Dr. Clayton's manuſcripts would not excite an extraordinary attention, or be attended with any very material advantage.

We forgot to mention, in the proper place, that the Biſhop of Clogher was a Member of the Royal Society, and of the Society of Antiquaries. He maintained a regular correſpondence with ſeveral gentlemen of eminent literature in this country; and, among the reſt, with the learned Printer, Mr. Bowyer; to whom he made a preſent of the copy-right of all his works publiſhed in England (o). His Lancaſhire eſtate he bequeathed to his neareſt male heir, Richard Clayton, Eſq; Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas in Ireland; but the greateſt ſhare of his fortune is inherited by Dr. Barnard, who married his niece, and of whom we need not ſay, that he is a gentleman whoſe reſpectable character is well known in the world.] K.

John, who was his eldeſt ſon, was born in 1613, at Loughborough (b), where his father was then aſſiſtant to the Rector; but he was educated at Hinckley, under the Rev. Richard Vynes (c), a man of genius and learning, who was afterwards as much diſtinguiſhed among the Preſbyterian party, as his ſcholar was among the Cavaliers [B]. In his fifteenth year our Poet was removed to Cambridge, and admitted of Chriſt's-College, 4th September, 1627 (d), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1631 (e). He was thence tranſplanted to the ſiſter foundation of St. John's-College, in the ſame univerſity, of which he was elected Fellow on the 27th of March, 1634 (f), and proceeded to the degree of Maſter of Arts in 1635 (g). Of this ſociety he continued many years a principal ornament, being one of the tutors, and highly reſpected by his pupils, ſome of whom afterwards attained to eminence [C]. [A] Son of the Rev. Thomas Cleiveland, &c.] Of this Thomas Cleiveland, M. A. we have the following eulogium in Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy (1):

"He was a very great ſufferer, [for epiſcopacy, "&c.] was father to the famous John Cleaveland "the Poet, and had, at the time of his ſequeſtration, "nine [eight] children, (ſeveral of which, beſides "the Poet, were ſufferers alſo); but how many of "them were then provided for, I know not. He "was diſpoſſeſt by the Committee of Leiceſter, died "in October 1652, and was a very worthy perſon, "and of a moſt exemplary life."

He was of an ancient family in Yorkſhire, that derived their name from that tract of country in the North-Riding, which is ſtill called CLEVELAND, wherein they had formerly large poſſeſſions, as may be ſeen in Dr. Naſh's Hiſtory of Worceſterſhire, 1782, fol. (2), and in Nichols's Hiſtory of Hinckley, 1783, 4to. (3), where their GENEALOGY is inſerted at large. One of the Poet Cleiveland's brothers, JOSEPH, had iſſue, which ſettling in Liverpool, acquired there a large fortune; and two of this family repreſented that Borough in Parliament, viz. John Cleiveland, Eſq; (ſon of Joſeph) in 1710, and William Cleiveland, Eſq; his ſon, in 1722. Another of the Poet's brothers, WILLIAM, was Rector of Oldbury and Quat, near Bridgnorth, in Shropſhire, and dying in 1666, left a ſon, who was grandfather of the Rev. William Cleiveland, M. A. now Rector of All-Saints pariſh in Worceſter; and four daughters, whereof the youngeſt was grandmother of Dr. Percy, the preſent Biſhop of Dromore in Ireland (4).—A ſiſter of theirs, ELIZABETH, married Mr. William Iliff, of Hinckley, from whom are deſcended a reſpectable family, to which, by marriage, is allied the ingenious author of the Hiſtory of Hinckley above-mentioned: A work to which this article is indebted for many curious particulars.

[B] Richard Vynes, a man of genius and learning.] David Lloyd, in his Memoirs (5), tells us, that Cleiveland owed "the heaving of his natural fancy, "by choiceſt elegancies in Greek and Latin, more "elegantly Engliſhed, (an exerciſe he improved "much by), to Mr. VINES, there ſchool-maſter."

[C] Some of his pupils attained to eminence.] One of theſe, JOHN LAKE, D. D. ſometime Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, had, "before he "was complete thirteen years of age, been com-"mitted there to the tuition of the famous Mr. "Cleiveland, for whoſe memory he always retained "a great reverence (7);" and under whoſe inſtructions he ſo far profited, that he became ſucceſſively Vicar of Leeds, and Biſhop of Man, Briſtol, and Chicheſter. have taken holy orders within ſix years after his being elected Fellow: but he was admitted on the Law line (h), (as the phraſe there is) and afterwards on that of Phyſic (*), which excuſed him from complying with this obligation; though it does not appear that he made either Law or Phyſic his profeſſion; for remaining at College, he became the Rhetoric Reader there, and was uſually employed by the ſociety in compoſing their ſpeeches [D] and epiſtles to eminent perſons (of which ſpecimens may be ſeen in his works), being in high repute, at that time, for the purity and terſeneſs of his Latin ſtyle. He alſo became celebrated for his occaſional poems in Engliſh, and at the breaking out of the Civil Wars, is ſaid to have been the firſt champion (i) that appeared in verſe for the Royal Cauſe; which he alſo ſupported by all his perſonal influence: particularly by exerting his intereſt in the town of Cambridge, to prevent Oliver Cromwell (then an obſcure candidate, but ſtrongly ſupported by the Puritan party) from being elected one of its members (k). Cromwell's ſtronger genius in this, as in every other purſuit, prevailing, Cleiveland is ſaid to have ſhown great diſcernment, by predicting, at ſo early a period, the fatal conſequences that long after enſued to the Cauſe of Royalty [E]. The Parliament party carrying all before them in the eaſtern counties, Cleiveland retired to the royal army, and with it to the King's head quarters at Oxford (l), where he was much admired and careſſed for his ſatirical poems on the oppoſite faction, eſpecially for his ſatire on the Scottiſh Covenanters, intitled, THE REBEL SCOT [F]. In his abſence he was deprived of his Fellowſhip,

This, according to Winſtanley (13), was in 1642. But a MS. dates it in 1641.

[E] He predicted the fatal conſequences.] For this fact we are indebted to the authors of his life, prefixed to his works, in 1677, who having obſerved, that "no man had more ſagacious prognoſticks," tell us, that after the election was over, Cleiveland ſaid, "with much paſſionate zeal, That ſingle vote had "ruined both Church and Kingdom." Whence it ſhould ſeem, that Cromwell gained this ſeat in Parliament by the majority of one vote only.

(13) See his Lives, &c. See Nichols's Hiſt. of Hinckley, 4to. p. 139.

The ſame writers mention another inſtance of his being "Vates in the whole import of the word, both "Poet and Prophet." When the King withdrew from Oxford, and ſurrendered himſelf to the Scots army, "upon ſome private intelligence three days "before the King reached them, Cleiveland foreſaw "the pieces of ſilver paying upon the banks of "Tweed, and that they were the price of his So- "vereign's blood, and predicted the tragical events."

[F] He was careſſed at Oxford for his ſatire, &c.] Cleiveland had been before at Oxford in the year 1637, and was then incorporated Maſter of Arts, with ſeveral other Cambridge men (14). But now his ſarcaſtic attacks on the oppoſite party would make him exceedingly popular there, eſpecially the ſatire above-mentioned. Of which we have the following proof: while he was now at Oxford he had his portrait painted by Fuller, (a three-quarter's length, now in poſſeſſion of his great-nephew the Biſhop of Dromore) wherein he is drawn holding a paper, inſcribed The Rebel Scot. An engraving from it is prefixed to the VIIth volume of Nichols's "Select Collection "of Miſcellany Poems, 1781," 12mo. where ſeveral of Cleiveland's poems are reprinted; and particularly this ſatire, which we ſhall here extract* as a ſpecimen of Cleiveland's manner; premiſing only, that it was intended by the author for a party rather than a national ſatire, as appears by his excepting the loyal Scots, &c.

THE REBEL SCOT.

HOW! Providence! and yet a Scottiſh crew!
Then, Madam Nature wears black patches too!
What ſhall our nation be in bondage thus
Unto a land that truckles under us?
Ring the bells backward; I am all on fire:
Not all the buckets in a country quire
Shall quench my rage. A Poet ſhould be fear'd
When angry, like a Comet's flaming beard.
And where's the Stoick can his wrath appeaſe
To ſee his country ſick of Pym's diſeaſe?
By Scotch invaſion, to be made a prey
To ſuch Pig-wiggen Myrmidons as they?
But that there's charm in verſe, I would not quote
The name of Scot without an antidote;
Unleſs my head were red, that I might brew
Invention there that might be poiſon too.
Were I a drowzy Judge whoſe diſmal note
Diſgorgeth halters, as a jugler's throat
Doth ribbands; could I in Sir Emperick's tone
Speak pills in phraſe, and quack deſtruction;
Or roar like Marſhal, that Geneva Bull,
Hell and damnation a pulpit full;
Yet to expreſs a Scot, to play that prize,
Not all thoſe mouth-granados can ſuffice:
Before a Scot can properly be curſt,
I muſt, like Hocus, ſwallow daggers firſt.
Come, keen Iambics, with your badgers feet,
And badger-like, bite till your teeth do meet:
Help, ye tart Satiriſts, to imp my rage
With all the ſcorpions, that ſhould whip this age.
Scots are like Witches; do but whet your pen;
Scratch till the blood come, they'll not hurt you then.
Now as the Martyrs were enforc'd to take
The ſhapes of beaſts, like hypocrites, at ſtake;
I'll baite my Scot ſo, yet not cheat your eyes,
A Scot within a beaſt, is no diſguiſe.
No more let Ireland brag, her harmleſs nation
Foſters no venom, ſince the Scot's plantation.
Nor can our's feign'd antiquity maintain;
Since they came in, England hath Wolves again.
The Scot, that kept the Tower, might have ſhown,
Within the grate of his own breaſt alone
The Leopard and the Panther, and ingroſs'd
What all thoſe wild Collegiates had coſt
The honeſt high-ſhoos, in their termly fees
Firſt to the ſalvage Lawyer, next to theſe.
Nature herſelf doth Scotchmen beaſts confeſs,
Making their country ſuch a wilderneſs;
A land that brings in queſtion and ſuſpenſe
God's omnipreſence, but that Charles came thence;
But that Montroſe' and Crawford's loyal band
Aton'd their ſins, and chriſten'd half the land.
Nor is it all the nation hath theſe ſpots;
There is a Church, as well as Kirk of Scots;
As in a picture, where the ſquinting paint
Shews Fiend on this ſide, and on that ſide Saint.

From Oxford Cleiveland was appointed to be Judge-Advocate in the garriſon at Newark, under Sir Richard Willis the governor, and has been commended (n) for his ſkilful and upright conduct in this difficult office [G], where he alſo diſtinguiſhed his pen occaſionally, by returning ſmart anſwers to the ſummons, and other addreſſes to the garriſon (o). Newark, after holding out the laſt of all the royal fortreſſes, was at length, in 1646, by the expreſs command of the King (then a priſoner in the Scots army), ſurrendered upon terms, which left Cleiveland in poſſeſſion of his liberty [H], but deſtitute of all means of ſupport, excepting what he derived from the hoſpitality

He that ſaw Hell in's melancholy dream,
And, in the twi-light of his fancy's theme,
Scar'd from his ſins, repented in a fright,
Had he view'd Scotland, had turn'd proſelyte.
A land where one may pray with curſt intent,
O may they never ſuffer baniſhment!
Had Cain been Scot, God would have chang'd his doom,
Not forc'd him wander, but confin'd him home.
Like Jews they ſpread, and as infection fly,
As if the Devil had ubiquity.
Hence 'tis they live at rovers, and defy
This or that place, rags of Geography,
They're citizens o' th' world; they're all in all,
Scotland's a nation epidemical.
And yet they ramble, not to learn the mode
How to be dreſt, or how to liſp, abroad:
To return knowing in the Spaniſh ſhrug,
Or which of the Dutch States a double jug
Reſembles moſt in belly, or in beard,
(The card by which the mariners are ſteer'd)
No; the Scots-Errant fight, and fight to eat;
Their oſtrich-ſtomachs make their ſwords their meat.
Nature with Scots as Tooth-drawers hath dealt,
Who uſe to hang their teeth upon their belt.
Yet wonder not at this their happy choice,
The Serpent's fatal ſtill to Paradiſe.
Sure England hath the hæmorrhoids, and theſe
On the North-poſtern of the patient ſeize,
Like Leeches; thus they phyſically thirſt
After our blood, but in the cure ſhall burſt.
Let them not think to make us run o' the ſcore,
To purchaſe villenage, as once before,
When an act paſs'd, to ſtroak them on the head,
Call them good ſubjects, buy them ginger-bread.
Nor gold, nor acts of grace, 'tis ſteel muſt tame
The ſtubborn Scot: a Prince that would reclaim Rebels by yielding, doth like him (or worſe)
Who ſaddled his own back, to ſhame his horſe.
Was it for this you left your leaner ſoil,
Thus to lard Iſrael with Egypt's ſpoil?
They are the Goſpel's life-guard, but for them
(The garriſon of New-Jeruſalem)
What would the Brethren do? The Cauſe! The Cauſe
Sack-poſſets, and the fundamental laws?
Lord! what a godly thing is want of ſhirts!
How a Scotch ſtomach, and no meat, converts!
They wanted food and raiment; ſo they took Religion for their Seamſtreſs, and their Cook.
Unmaſk them well; their honours and eſtate,
As well as conſcience, are ſophiſticate.
Shrive but their titles, and their money poize,
A Laird and twenty pound pronounc'd with noiſe,
When conſtrued, but for a plain Yeoman go,
And a good ſober ten-pence, and well ſo.
Hence then, you proud Impoſtors; get you gone,
You Picts in gentry and devotion;
You ſcandals to the ſtock of verſe, a race
Able to bring the Gibbet in diſgrace.
Hyperbolus by ſuffering did traduce
The Oſtraciſm, and ſham'd it out of uſe.
The Indian, that Heaven did forſwear,
Becauſe he heard ſome Spaniards were there,
Had he but known what Scots in Hell had been,
He would, Eraſmus like, have hung between.
My Muſe hath done. A voider for the nonce;
I wrong the Devil ſhould I pick their bones.
That diſh is his; for when the Scots deceaſe,
Hell, like their nation, feeds on barnacles.
A Scot, when from the gallows-tree got looſe,
Drops into Styx, and turns a Soland Gooſe.

[G] Has been commended for his ſkilful and upright conduct.] "His next ſtage was the garriſon of New-"ark, where he was Judge-Advocate, until the ſur-"render: and by an excellent temperature of both, "was a juſt and prudent Judge for the King, and a "faithful advocate for the country (15)."

(15) Life by Biſhop Lake, &c. ubi ſupra.

The Biſhop of Dromore has in his poſſeſſion an authentic copy of the commiſſion, (ſigned by King Charles I. with his own hand) dated at "our Court "at Newarke," 12th October, 1645, by which Sir Richard Willis the governor, and other commiſſioners therein mentioned, are impowered to puniſh all offences committed by the ſoldiers, and to determine all differences between them and the countrymen by martial law.

A particular reaſon for fixing Cleiveland in the garriſon at Newark, has been produced by the ingenious and diligent Hiſtorian of Hinckley (16), from a periodical publication of the oppoſite party, intitled, "The Kingdomes Weekly Intelligencer," No. 101. p. 811. for Tueſday, 27 May, 1645. "But to "ſpeak ſomething of our friend Cleveland, that "grand malignant of Cambridge, we heare that he "is now at Newarke, where he hath the title of Ad-"vocate put upon him. His office and employment "is, to gather all the Colledge rents within the "power of the King's forces in thoſe parts, which "he diſtributes to ſuch as are turned out of their "Fellowſhips at Cambridge for their malignancie. "If the royal party be thus careful to ſupplie their "friends, ſure it is neceſſary to take ſome courſe to "relieve thoſe who are turned out of their houſes "and livings for adhering to the Parliament."

From a collection of old pamphlets and journals during the great rebellion between 1639 and 1660, and ſorted by Mr. Carte, in Sir John Hinde Cotton's library at Madingley, near Cambridge.

[H] Newark—ſurrendered,—which left him in poſſeſſion of his liberty.] On the occaſion of this ſurrender, a late periodical Critic (17) has given us a remarkable ſtory, which is thus introduced:

(17) See the Critical Review, in its account of Granger's Biog. Hiſtory.

"Mr. Granger ſays, that Cleaveland never was in "holy orders; Lloyd tells us, that he was Fellow of "St. John's, and that he was turned out of his Fel-"lowſhip. Be that as it will, his famous ſatire againſt "the Scotch rendered him extremely obnoxious to "that nation, and he happened to be taken priſoner "by a party of their troops in the North, commanded "by David Leſley, afterwards Lord Newark. Being "diſcovered by the papers he had about him, the of-"ficers who took him, gave him an aſſurance of the "gallows, and Cleaveland received the news with "that magnanimity and pride, which is the conco-"mitant of great ſelf-conſequence; for he conſoled "himſelf with the thoughts of dying a martyr in the "cauſe of his ſovereign, and having his name tranſ-"mitted to poſterity with peculiar encomiums in the "annals of loyalty. He was introduced, with ſome "other priſoners, to Leſley, who could neither read "nor write, and who awarded to each his proper "fate, by hanging, whipping, or impriſoning. "When it came to be Cleaveland's turn, he preſented "himſelf at the bar with a conſcious dignity, and "his enemies did not fail to aggravate his offences, "producing at the ſame time a bundle of verſes. 'Is "this all, ſaid the General, ye have to charge him "with; for ſhame, for ſhame! let the poor fellow hospitality and generosity of his brother Loyalists (p), among whom he lived up and down some years, obscure and unnoticed by the ruling party, till in November, 1655, he was seized at Norwich, as "a person of great abilities," adverse and dangerous to the reigning government [I]; and being sent to Yarmouth, he was there imprisoned for some time, till he sent a petition to the Lord-Protector, wherein the address of the writer hath been much admired, who, while he honestly avows his principles, has recourse to such moving topics, as might sooth his oppressor, and procure his enlargement [K]: in which he was not disappointed, for the Protector generously set him at liberty,

"go about his business, and sell his ballads.' This "contemptuous slight affected Cleaveland so much, "that he is said to have drowned the remembrance of "it in strong liquors, which hastened his death. "It appears, however, by Thurloe's papers, that "Cleaveland was a person of note amongst the Roy-"alists, and that he had a place of some consequence "in their army."

As this article was attributed to a countryman of Lesley's (18), shall we suppose that he took this method to be revenged on the author of the REBEL SCOT?—It is strange, however, that quoting Thurloe (19), he should not have observed that Cleiveland was nine years after the surrender of Newark, possessed of so much health and vigour, as to alarm the adverse government: being at last cut off by an epidemical disease, after he had a dozen years survived this pretended suicide of himself by strong liquors.

(19) See below, note [I].

[I] He was seized at Norwich, &c.] We have the following heads of his examination preserved in Thurloe's State Papers, 1742, fol. vol. IV. page 185.

"Major-General Haynes, &c. to the President of the Council.

"May it please your Lordship,

"IN observance to the orders of his Highness and Council, sent unto us, We have this day sent to the garrison of Yarmouth one John Cleveland, of Norwich, late Judge-Advocate at Newark, who we have deemed to be comprized within the second head.

"The Reasons of Judgment are;

"1. He confesseth, that about a year since he came from London to the city of Norwich, and giveth no account of any business he hath there, only he pretends, that Edward Cooke*, Esq; maketh use of him to help him in his studies.

* Was not this the ancestor of the late Earl of Leicester, Lord Viscount Coke, of Holkam, in Norfolk, &c.?

"2. Mr. Cleveland confesseth, that he hath lived in Mr. Cooke's house ever since he came to the said city; and that he but seldom went into the city, and never but once into the country. Indeed his privacy has been such, that none, or but few, save Papists, or Cavileeres, did know, that there was any such person resident in these parts.

"3. For that the place of the said Mr. Cleveland his abode, viz. the said Mr. Cooke's, is a family of notorious disorder, and where Papists, delinquents, and other disaffected persons of the late King's party do often resort, more than to any family in the said city or county of Norfolk, as is commonly reported.

"4. Mr. Cleveland liveth in a genteel garbe; yet he confesseth, that he hath no estate but 20l. per annum allowed by two gentlemen, and 30l. per annum by the said Mr. Cooke.

"5. Mr. Cleveland is a person of great abilities, and so able to do the greater disservice: all which we humbly submit, and remain

Norwich, November 10, 1655.

[K] He sent a petition to the Lord-Protector—who generously set him at liberty.] This Lloyd seems to hint was a singular instance, and therefore the greater compliment paid to the petitioner. His words are (speaking of the petition) "the only thing that ever "I heard wrought upon him, that had been too hard "for all swords (20)."

(20) Memoires, p. 618.

The reader will, probably, not be displeased to see a composition of so delicate a nature, yet so successfull in its effect; it is therefore subjoined here at length.

"May it please your Highness,

"RULERS, within the circle of their government, have a claim to that which is said of the Deity, 'They have their centre every where, and their circumference no where.' It is in this confidence that I address to your Highness, knowing that no place in the nation is so remote, as not to share in the ubiquity of your care; no prison so close, as to shut me up from partaking of your influence. My Lord, it is my misfortune, that after ten years retirement from being engaged in the differences of the state, having wound up myself in private recess, and my comportment to the public so inoffensive, that in all this time neither fears nor jealousies have scrupled at my actions: being about three months since at Norwich, I was fetched by a guard before the commissioners, and sent prisoner to Yarmouth; and if it be not a new offence to make an enquiry wherein I offended (for hitherto my fault was kept as close as my person), I am induced to believe, that, next to my adherence to the Royal party, the cause of my confinement is the narrowness of my estate; for none stand committed, whose estate can bail them. I only am the prisoner, who have no acres to be my hostage. Now if my poverty be criminal, (with reverence be it spoken) I implead your Highness, whose victorious arms have reduced me to it, as accessory to my guilt. Let it suffice, my Lord, that the calamity of the war hath made us poor; do not punish us for it! Who ever did penance for being ravished? Is it not enough that we are stript so bare, but it must be made in order to a severer lash! must our sores be engraven with our wounds? must we first be made cripples, and then beaten with our own crutches? Poverty, if it be a fault, 'tis its own punishment; who pays more for it, pays use upon use. I beseech your Highness put some bounds to the overthrow, and do not pursue the chace to the other world. Can your thunder be leveled so low as our groveling condition? Can your towering spirit, which hath quarried upon kingdoms, make a stoop at us, who are the rubbish of these ruins? Methinks I hear your former atchievements interceding with you, not to sully your glories with trampling upon the prostrate, nor clog the wheel of your chariot with so degenerous a triumph. The most renowned heroes have ever with such tenderness cherished their captives, that their swords did but cut out work for their courtesies. Those that fell by their prowess, sprung by their favour, as if they had struck them down only to make them rebound the higher. I hope your Highness, as you are the rival of their fame, will be no less of their virtues. The noblest trophy that you can erect to your honour is to raise the afflicted. And since you have subdued all opposition, it now remains, that you attack yourself, and with acts of mildness vanquish your victory. It is not long since, my Lord, that you knocked off the shackles from most of our party, and, by a grand release, did spread your clemency as far as your territories. Let not new proscriptions interrupt your jubilee.

liberty, disdaining to remember on the throne, the opposition he had received in his canvas for Parliament as a private Burgess. Cleiveland thence retired to London, where he is said to have found a generous Mæcenas (q), and being much admired among all persons of his own party, became member of a club of Wits and Loyalists (r), which Butler, the author of Hudibras, also frequented [L]. Cleiveland then lived in chambers at Gray's-inn (of which Butler is said to have been a member (s), and being seized with an epidemic intermitting fever, died there on Thursday morning, 29th April, 1658 (t). His friends paid the last honours to his remains by a splendid funeral: for his body was removed to Hunsdon-house (u), and thence carried for interment, on Saturday, 1st May, to the parish church of St. Michael Royal, on College-Hill, London [M], followed by a numerous attendance of persons eminent for their loyalty or learning: to whom his funeral sermon was preached by his intimate friend Dr. John Pearson, afterwards Bishop of Chester, author of the learned exposition of the Creed [N].

Cleiveland has had the fate of those Poets, who, "paying their court to temporary "prejudices, have been at one time too much praised, and at another too much neglected (w)." Both his subjects, and his manner of writing, made his poems extremely popular among his contemporaries, but entirely forgotten and disregarded since. For his Manner, he excelled among that class of writers, so much admired in the last century, whom our great Critic (x) has aptly termed "Metaphysical Poets," who abound with witty rather than just thoughts, with far-fetched conceits, and learned allusions, that only amuse for a moment, utterly neglecting that beautiful simplicity and propriety, which will interest and please through every age. For his Subjects he generally chose the party disputes of the day, which now are no longer understood or regarded. Contemporary with Milton, he was in his time exceedingly preferred before him; and Milton's own nephew tells us, he was by some esteemed the best of the English Poets [O]. But Cleiveland is now sunk into oblivion, while Milton's fame is universally diffused. Yet Milton's works could, with difficulty, gain admission to the press, at the time when it was pouring forth those of Cleiveland in innumerable impressions. But behold the difference! The press now continually teems with re-publications of the Paradise Lost, &c. whereas the last edition of Cleiveland's Works was in 8vo. 1687 [P].

jubilee. Let not that your lenity be slandered as the ambush of your further rigour. For the service of his Majesty (if it be objected) I am so far from excusing it, that I am ready to alledge it in my vindication. I cannot conceit that my fidelity to my Prince should taint me in your opinion: I should rather expect it should recommend me to your favour: had we not been faithful to our King, we could not have given ourselves to be so to your Highness; you had then trusted us gratis, whereas now we have our former loyalty to vouch us. You see, my Lord, how much I presume upon the greatness of your spirit, that dare prevent my indictment with so frank a confession, especially in this which I may so safely deny that it is almost arrogancy in me to own it; for the truth is, I was not qualified enough to serve him; all I could do, was to bear a part in his sufferings, and give myself to be crushed with his fall. Thus my charge is doubled; my obedience to my Sovereign, and what is the result of that, my want of fortune. Now whatever reflection I have upon the former, I am a true penitent for the latter. My Lord, you see my crimes; as to my defence, you bear it about you. I shall plead nothing in my justification, but your Highness's clemency, which, as it is the constant inmate of a valiant breast, if you graciously be pleased to extend it to your suppliant, in taking me out of this withering durance, your Highness will find that Mercy will establish you more than Power; though all the days of your life were as pregnant with victories as your twice auspicious third of September.

Your Highness's humble and submissive Petitioner,

J. CLEIVELAND."

[L] He was member of a club, which Butler frequented.] Butler was a great admirer of Cleiveland's wit; and has copied many of his images and thoughts into his celebrated Poem above-mentioned. The learned and ingenious Dr. Farmer has in his possession a copy of Cleiveland's Poems, in which he has marked many passages that have been imitated in Hudibras. From this judicious Critic a more compleat commentary of that mock-heroic Poem could be given, than the world has yet seen.

Wood, in the passage referred to. It was destroyed in the fire, 1666.

"John Cleaveland, a notable high-soaring witty "Loyalist of Cambridge, whose verses in the time "of the Civil War, begun to be in great request, "both for their wit and zeal to the King's cause, for "which indeed he appeared the first, if not only, "eminent champion in verse against the Presbyterian "party; but most especially against the Kirk and "Scotch Covenant, which he prosecuted with such "a satirical fury, that the whole nation fares the "worse for it, lying under a most grievous poetical "censure. In fine, so great a man hath Cleaveland "been in the estimation of the generality, in regard "his conceits were out of the common road and "wittily far-fetcht, that grave men, in outward ap-"pearance, have not spared, in my hearing, to affirm "him the BEST OF ENGLISH POETS, and let them "think so still, who ever please, provided it be made "no article of faith."

[P] Cleiveland's works in 1687, 8*vo.*] This is the last and most compleat edition of his works (for if there is any of later date, it is only this with the title page re-printed). This edition, 1687, is made up of the following separate publications. The first part from "Cleveland's Vindiciæ," containing only genuine genuine pieces collected by J. L. and S. D. as is described above in note [C]: The second part from "J. Cleaveland revived: Poems, Orations, and "Epistles, and other of his genuine incomparable "Pieces; With some other exquisite Remains of the "most eminent Wits of both Universities, that were "his Contemporaries. This second edition *, &c. Lond. 1660, 12mo. (with a curious preface, signed E. Williamson, Newark, Nov. 21, 1658, in which he speaks of "the intimacy he had with Mr. Cleaveland "before and since these Civil Wars," and of that Poet's "ever-to-be-honoured friend of Gray's-inn," who was probably the Mecænas mentioned by Wood (24). To these is added a third piece, being the History of Wat Tyler's Insurrection, under the quaint title of "The Rustick Rampant," &c. In the second part of this edition, 1687, the notice is suppressed, that occurred in the original title-page and preface, that this part contained "other Re-"mains of eminent Wits, &c." which is indeed the case with most of the poems in it, only a few of them being of Cleiveland's own writing. For the verses in page 186, were by Tho. Weaver (25). All that occur between page 200 and 265, are from R. Fletcher's "Ex otio negotium, &c." being poems printed 1656, 8vo. and the following are from the "poems "of John Hall, 1646," 12mo. viz. those here printed in page 297, 298. 302. 309. 315. 334. 353. 358. 375. 377. The Elegy, in page 310, is by Jasper Mayne (26). The Song, in page 336, has been attributed to Sir J. Denham. And some of the rest belong to other writers.

But to show how popular Cleiveland was among his contemporaries, we shall here enumerate several of his editions (27); which were printed with more or fewer of his pieces, in 1647 (28), 1651, 1653, 1654 twice, 1658, 1659, 1660, 1661, 1662, 1665, 1667, 1668; and then in 1677 (which last date, Wood says, he has seen misprinted 1617; but the writer of this note has now before him two copies of this edition, containing some variations, yet both rightly dated 1677). Lastly, in 1687, 8vo.]

CLIFFORD (George), the third Earl of Cumberland, of that noble and ancient family [A], was a person very eminent for his skill in Navigation. He was born in the year 1558 (a), and educated at Peter-House in Cambridge, where he had for his tutor the celebrated John Whitgift, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. In this place, he applied himself chiefly to the study of the Mathematicks, which his genius led him to; whereby he became qualified for the several great expeditions he undertook afterwards (b). The first time he had any public employment, was in the year 1586, when he was one of the Peers who sat in judgment upon Mary Queen of Scots (c). But having a greater inclination to act by sea than by land; and (according to the fashion in the brave and warlike reign of Queen Elizabeth) being bent on making foreign discoveries, and defeating the ambitious designs of the Spaniard, who was preparing his invincible Armada for conquering England; he fitted out, at his own charge, a little fleet, consisting of three ships, and a pinnace [B], with a view to send them into the South-Sea, on purpose to annoy the Spanish settlements there [C]. They sailed from Gravesend the 26th of June, 1586, and from Plymouth the 17th of August; but were forced back by contrary winds into Dartmouth. From whence putting out again on the 29th, they fell in with the coast of Barbary the 17th of September, and the next day halled in with the road of Santa Cruz. On the 25th, they came to the Rio del Oro, just under the northern tropic, where they anchored (d). Searching up that river the next day, they found it to be as broad fourteen or fifteen leagues upward, as at the mouth, which was two leagues over: but met with no town nor house. The last of September they departed for Sierra Leona, where they arrived the 21st of October. Going on shore, they burnt a town of the negroes, and brought away to their ships about fourteen or fifteen tons of rice: and having furnished themselves with wood and water, they sailed the 21st of November from Sierra Leona, making the Straights of Magellan. The second of January, 1586-7, they discovered land; and, on the 4th day of that month, fell in with the American shore in 30 deg. 40 min. south latitude. Continuing their course southward, they took, January 10, not far from Rio de la Plata, a small Portuguese ship; and the next day another: out of which they furnished themselves with what necessaries they wanted (e). The 12th of January they came to Seal-Island, and two days after to the Green-Island, near which they took in water. Returning to Seal-Island, a consultation was held on the 7th of February, whether they should continue their course for the South-Sea, and winter in the Straights of Magellan, or spend three or four months upon the coast of Brasil, and proceed on their voyage in the spring? The majority being for the former, they went as far as 44 degrees of southern latitude. But, meeting with storms and contrary winds, they took a final resolution, on the 21st of February, to return to the coast of Brasil: accordingly, they fell in with it the 5th of April;

[A] The third Earl of Cumberland, of that noble and ancient family.] They derive their descent from —— Pontz, who is supposed to have come into England with William the Conqueror. His younger son, Richard de Pontz, was father of Walter, who seating himself at Clifford in Herefordshire, took his surname from that place. Lineally descended from him, was, Henry Lord Clifford, who, on the 18th of June 1525, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Cumberland. His eldest son and heir was Henry, father of George, of whom we are treating in this article (1).

[C] To annoy the Spanish settlements there.] It was resolved by the judicious in that age, as Dr. Fuller rightly observes (3), that the way to humble the Spanish greatness, was not by pinching and pricking him in the Low Countries, which only emptied his veins of such blood as was quickly refilled: but the way to make it a cripple for ever, was by cutting off the Spanish sinews of war, his money from the West-Indies.

and, after taking in water and proviſions in the bay of Camana, came into the port of Baya the 11th. Eight Portugueſe ſhips being there, they found means to carry off four of them, (the leaſt of which were of a hundred and thirty tons) notwithſtanding all the enemies reſiſtance: and alſo fetched a ſupply of freſh proviſion from the ſhore. The 16th and 17th of May they got a quantity of ſugar out of the Portugueſe ingenio's (f). The 26th of the ſame month, they made themſelves maſters of a new ſhip, of a hundred and twenty tons burthen, laden with meal and ſugar. On the 3d of June, ſome were for purſuing their voyage to the South-Sea [D]. But finding themſelves, upon examination, in want of a due number of men, and ſufficient proviſions, they reſolved, on the 10th, to ſail back to England; where they arrived September 29, after an unproſperous voyage (g). This ſame year, the Earl of Cumberland went, with many other Engliſh noblemen and gentlemen, to the relief of Sluys, then beſieged by the Duke of Parma; but at his arrival, he found the place ſurrendered (h). In 1588, he was one of thoſe brave perſons who put themſelves on board the Engliſh fleet, to oppoſe the Spaniſh Armada that was advancing to invade England. He commanded, on that occaſion, the Elizabeth Bonaventure, and ſignalized himſelf in a remarkable manner; eſpecially in the laſt engagement with the Spaniards, near Calais (i). Queen Elizabeth was ſo pleaſed with his good ſervices, that ſhe granted him a commiſſion, dated October 4, 1588, to purſue his intended voyage to the South-Sea: and, for his greater honour and encouragement, lent him one of her own royal ſhips, named the Golden Lion, to be the Admiral. This he victualled and furniſhed at his own charge; and ſailed about the end of October, attended with many brave Engliſh gentlemen. In the Channel, he took a ſhip of Dunkirk, named the Hare, laden with merchandize for Spain, which he ſent home. But contrary winds at firſt, and afterwards a violent ſtorm, which forced him to cut his main-maſt by the board, deprived him of farther hopes and ability to proſecute his deſigns on the Spaniſh coaſts; ſo that he returned to England (k). However, not diſcouraged by this unhappy diſappointment, he undertook a third voyage to the Weſt-Indies in 1589. For that purpoſe, he obtained the Queen's leave, and one ſhip of the royal navy, called the Victory; to which adding three other ſmall ſhips, furniſhed, at his own expence, with about four hundred men, and all neceſſaries [E], he ſet ſail from Plymouth the 18th of June (l). Three days after, they took three French ſhips belonging to the Leaguers (m) in that nation. Meeting, on the 13th of July, with eleven ſhips bound for Hamburgh, and other neighbouring ports, they took out of them a quantity of pepper and cinnamon belonging to a Jew of Liſbon, valued at about four thouſand five hundred pounds. The firſt of Auguſt, they came within ſight of St. Michael, one of the Azores, and put out Spaniſh colours, the more eaſily to execute the project they had formed, of carrying off in the night ſome ſhips that were in the harbour. Accordingly, they cut the cables of three of them, and towed them away: they were loaded with wine and oil from Seville. The 7th, they took another little veſſel, whoſe lading was Madeira wine, woollen cloth, ſilks, &c. Having gotten information that the Spaniſh carracks (a very valuable booty) were at Tercera, they made haſte thither: and by the way looked into Fyal Road, Auguſt the 27th, whence they brought away a ſhip of two hundred and fifty tons, and fourteen guns, that was moored to the caſtle, and loaded with ſugar, ginger, and hides. They fetched out likewiſe five other ſmall ſhips, newly come from Guinea, notwithſtanding the briſk fire of the enemy, and ſent four of them to England on the 30th of Auguſt. At their coming near Tercera, being told that the carracks had been gone thence eight days, they returned back to Fyal on the 10th of September; and having made themſelves maſters of the town with much eaſe, obliged the inhabitants to ranſom it for two thouſand ducats (n). They took there alſo fifty-eight pieces of iron ordnance. The 27th of that month they went to St. Michael; and the 1ſt of October to Gratioſa, where they got a new ſupply of proviſions. On the 14th they took a French ſhip loaden with fiſh from Newfoundland. The ſame day, and the five following, the Earl of Cumberland endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of fifteen ſail of the Spaniſh Weſt-India fleet, that had put into the port of Angra, in Tercera: but finding it too dangerous an attempt, he deſiſted. Next he ſailed to St. Michael's; where being hindered from taking in freſh water, he went for it to St. Mary's Iſland; and finding two Braſil ſhips there, which the people were trying to bring a-ground, Captain Liſter boldly carried one of them off, [D] Some were for purſuing their voyage to the South-Sea.] Captain Liſter, in particular, had ſo great a deſire to perform that voyage, according to the Earl of Cumberland's direction, that he went to the Admiral, and requeſted him to give him ſix buts of wine, one barrel of oil, three or four barrels of fleſh, and to have one Thomas Hood a Pilot, and ſeven or eight ſeamen in exchange for ſome landmen; and, by God's help, he, with the Bark Clifford, would alone proceed for the South-Sea: but the Admiral mightily withſtood his motion, and would grant none of his requeſts (4).

notwithſtanding the enemy's violent fire. But the Earl attempting to take the other, had two parts of his own men killed or wounded; and received himſelf three ſhot upon his ſhield, and a fourth on his ſide, though not deep: his head was likewiſe broken with ſtones, and all covered with blood, and both his head and legs were much burnt with granadoes (o). Not being able to have water there, he took ſome in at St. George's Iſland, October 29; and then reſolved to ſail for England, taking the coaſt of Spain in his way. On the 4th of November, they had the good fortune to make themſelves maſters of a Portugueſe ſhip of one hundred and ten tons, freighted with ſugar and Braſil wood: and two days after, of another, between three and four hundred tons, loaden with hides, cochineal, ſugar, china diſhes, and ſilver. Both were valued at fourteen thouſand pounds, and forthwith were ſent to England: but the latter was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Cornwall, and all the men periſhed except five or ſix: however, ſome of the goods were ſaved (p). The Earl himſelf being kept out at ſea, by ſtorms and contrary winds, longer than he expected, was, for want of proviſions, reduced to the greateſt extremities [F]. But at length, on the 2d of December, reaching Bantry-Bay, in the weſt of Ireland, and having there refreſhed himſelf and his men, he arrived ſafe at Falmouth the 29th of December, after a tedious paſſage of nine days from Ireland (q). In 1591, his Lordſhip undertook a fourth voyage to the coaſt of Spain, with five ſhips [G], fitted out at his own charge (r). He ſailed from England in May; and, in his way to the Spaniſh coaſts, found ſeveral Dutch ſhips coming from Liſbon loaden with ſpices, which he took out of them. Theſe ſpices he determined to ſend to England, in a ſhip guarded by the Golden Noble, his Rear-Admiral; but they were taken in a calm, by ſome Portugueſe gallies from Penicha; one of the Captains, with ſeveral of the men, ſlain; and the reſt carried priſoners to Penicha, and from thence to Liſbon. His Lordſhip took, beſides the ſpices juſt now mentioned, a veſſel freighted with wine, which he unloaded into his own: and two ſhips laden with ſugar; but one having a leak that could not be found, he left it: the other he ſent for England; and, by contrary winds, and want of victuals, it was forced into the Groyne, where it fell into the enemy's hands. Theſe ſeveral misfortunes obliged the Earl to return to England, after having ſent advice to the Lord Thomas Howard, Admiral of the Engliſh fleet, then waiting at the Azores, to intercept the Weſt-India plate fleet, that there was a large Spaniſh ſquadron ready to put out to ſea (s). The next year the Earl of Cumberland undertook a fifth

[F] Was, for want of proviſions, reduced to the greateſt extremities.] The tragical account left us by one of the ſufferers (6), of the great extremities they were reduced to for want of drink, is equal to the ſcene of hunger in Beaumont and Fletcher's ſea-voyage. 'Soon after, ſays he, the wind came about to 'the eaſtwards, ſo that we could not fetch any part 'of England. And hereupon alſo our allowance of 'drinke, which was ſcant ynough before, was yet 'more ſcanted, becauſe of the ſcarcitie thereof in the 'ſhippe. So that now a man was allowed but halfe a 'pinte at a meale, and that many times colde water, 'and ſcarce ſweete. Notwithſtanding this was an 'happie eſtate in compariſon of that which followed: 'for from halfe a pinte we came to a quarter, and that 'laſted not long neither; ſo that by reaſon of this 'great ſcarcitie of drinke, and contrarietie of winde, 'we thought to put into Ireland, there to relieve our 'wants. But when wee came neer thither, we were 'driven ſo farre to Lee-ward, that we could fetch no 'part of Ireland. In the mean time we were allowed 'every man three or foure ſpoones full of vineger to 'drinke at a meale: for other drinke we had none, 'ſaving onely at two or three meales, when we had 'inſtead hereof as much wine, which was wringed out 'of wine-lees that remained. With this hard fare '(for by reaſon of our great want of drinke, wee durſt 'eate but very little) wee continued for a ſpace of a 'fortnight or thereabouts: ſaving that now and then 'wee feaſted for it in the meane time; and that was 'when there fell any haile or raine: the hail-ſtones 'wee gathered up and did eate them more pleaſantly 'than if they had bene the ſweeteſt comfits in the 'world. The raine-drops were ſo carefully ſaved, 'that ſo neere as wee coulde, not one was loſt in all 'our ſhippe. Some hanged up ſheetes tied with cordes 'by the foure corners, and a weight in the midſt that 'the water might runne downe thither, and ſo be re-'ceived into ſome veſſel ſet or hanged underneth: 'ſome that wanted ſheetes, hanged up napkins, and 'cloutes, and watched them till they were thorow wet, 'then wringing and ſucking out the water. And that 'water which fell downe and waſhed away the filth 'and ſoyling of the ſhippe, trod under foote, as bad 'as running down the kennell many times when it 'raineth, was not loſt, but watched and attended 'carefully, yea ſometimes with ſtrife and contention, 'at every ſcupper-hole, and other place where it ran 'down, with diſhes, pots, cannes, and jarres, where-'of ſome drunk hearty draughts even as it was, mud, 'and all, without tarrying to cleanſe or ſettle it: others 'cleanſed it firſt, but not often, for it was ſo thicke 'and went ſo ſlowly thorow, that they might ill en-'dure to tary ſo long, and were loth to loſe too much 'of ſuch precious ſtuff: ſome licked with their 'tongues, like dogges, the boards under feete, the 'ſides, railes, and maſts of the ſhippe: others that 'were more ingenious, faſtened girdles or ropes about 'the maſtes, dawbing tallow betwixt them and the 'maſte, that the rain might not run down between, in 'ſuch ſort, that thoſe ropes or girdles hanging lower 'on the one ſide than on the other, a ſpout of leather 'was faſtened to the loweſt part of them, that all the 'raine-drops that came running downe the maſte, 'might meete together at that place, and there be re-'ceived.——Some alſo put bullets of lead into their 'mouthes to ſlake their thirſt. Now in every corner 'of the ſhippe were heard the lamentable cries of 'ſicke and wounded men ſounding wofully in our 'eares, crying out and pitifully complaining for want 'of drinke, being ready to die, yea many dying for 'lacke thereof, ſo as by reaſon of this great extremitie 'we loſt many more men, then wee had done all the 'voyage before.'

expedition,

expedition, in which he choſe not to make uſe of any of her Majeſty's ſhips [H]. He intended to have commanded in this voyage in perſon; but he was ſo croſſed with winds, that three months proviſions were ſpent in harbours, before they could get to the weſtward of Plymouth: whereupon, being diſappointed in his principal deſign, namely, the taking of the outward-bound Spaniſh carracks, he transferred the chief command to Captain Norton, with inſtructions to go to the Azores, and returned himſelf to London. His little fleet purſued their voyage, and one of the ſhips (t) took, near Caſcais, and within ſhot of the caſtle, a Portugueſe ſhip, which was conducted to England by the Golden Noble. The reſt went to the Azores, and, with the aſſiſtance of other Engliſh ſhips [I], attacked the Santa Cruz, a large carrack, in the road of Lagowna, which the Spaniards ſet on fire, after having put the beſt of its cargo on ſhore; but the Engliſh landed, and made themſelves maſters both of it and the town. The 3d of Auguſt they took another rich carrick, named Madre de Dios, or the Mother of God, valued at a hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, which was brought to Dartmouth (u). The Earl of Cumberland's ſhare, in proportion to his number of ſhips and men employed in that ſervice, muſt have amounted to a very conſiderable ſum: but, becauſe his commiſſion had not provided for the caſe of his return, and the ſubſtituting another in his room, it was adjudged, that he ſhould depend on the Queen's mercy and bounty; and, by reaſon of ſeveral embezzlements, not above the fifth part of the ſhip's value being brought to account, his Lordſhip was forced to ſit down contented with thirty-ſix thouſand pounds; and that too as a mere matter of bounty and favour, not as his juſt right (w). The Earl, not hereby diſcouraged, undertook a ſixth voyage, in the year 1593. Queen Elizabeth lent him, for this expedition, two ſhips of her royal navy, namely, the Golden Lion, Admiral, which his Lordſhip commanded in perſon; and the Bonadventure, Vice-Admiral: to which he added four other ſhips (x). He had not been long at ſea, before he took two French ſhips of great value, guarded by fourteen great hulks, one of which he carried with him, and ſent the other to England. When he came near the Azores, hearing that the Spaniards had a fleet there to intercept him; and perceiving, by an advice-boat of theirs which he took, that they were much ſuperior to him in ſtrength, he kept company with them one day, and then withdrew at ten or twelve leagues diſtance, and ſo continued for three weeks. In this time, being ſeized with a violent fit of illneſs, he left the command of his little fleet to Captain Monſon, (who took one prize afterwards) and returned to England: this proving the moſt gainful voyage he ever made. Whilſt he was near the coaſt of Spain, he ſent three of his ſhips (y) to the Weſt-Indies. They firſt touched at St. Lucia and Martinico, where they refreſhed themſelves; and then proceeding to Margarita, an iſland famous for the pearl-fiſheries, ſeized there a large quantity of pearl, to the value of two thouſand pounds, beſides other booty; and obliged alſo the inhabitants to pay them two thouſand ducats in pearl, to ſave their town from being plundered. They ſailed next to Cumana, to the iſlands of Aruba and Curaſſow, and to Rio de la Hache, which they intended to have taken, but found the people ready for them, and learned that they had carried their goods up to the mountains: they therefore ſet ſail for Hiſpaniola, and having viſited ſeveral ports round it, and alſo the iſlands of Mona and Savona, went up the river Socko in Hiſpaniola, where they exacted large contributions, threatning otherwiſe to pillage the Spaniards farm-houſes. At Domingo they took a fine frigate, which they brought to England. Thence they went to Jamaica, to Cuba, Cape Corientes, and Cape St. Antonio, where they waited for ſome time in vain for ſhips coming from the Havannah. After eight months ſpent in thoſe parts, the Pilgrim ſailed for England, and arrived at Plymouth May 14, 1594. But the Antonio, and the frigate, went to the Bay of Honduras, where, near Porto Cavallo, they found ſeven Spaniſh ſhips: from ſix of them the Spaniards had taken off the rudders, that they might be diſabled from ſailing; and refuſing to ranſom them, the Engliſh ſet them on fire. But they firſt took out the beſt effects, and put them on board the Spaniſh Admiral, a ſhip of two hundred and fifty tons, which they brought to England; and arrived at Plymouth the 15th of May, the next day after the Pilgrim (z). Before the return of theſe ſhips, the Earl of Cumberland had, at his own

So he hired of the Merchants, the Tigre, a ſhip of 600 tons, furniſhed by the owners for three hundred pounds a month wages, in which he went in perſon; adding thereto his own ſhip the Samſon, and the Golden Noble, with two ſmall ſhips more (8); commanded by Captain Nicolas Downton, and Capt. charge, with the help of ſome adventurers, fitted out a ſmall fleet [K], deſigned for the Azores, and particularly for the iſland of Tercera. They ſailed from Plymouth, April 6, 1594, and about the 25th, took a ſmall bark of Viana in Portugal, loaden with Galicia wines, and other commodities, which they divided amongſt themſelves. On the 2d of June, they came within ſight of St. Michael's Iſland, one of the Azores; and, on the 13th of the ſame month, met (a) with a large Portugueſe carrack, of two thouſand tons, called Las cinque Llagas, or the Five Wounds, returning from the Eaſt-Indies. They attacked it very vigorouſly, and would probably have become maſters of it; but it being accidentally ſet on fire during the engagement, was blown up, with a great quantity of powder it had on board. After this diſaſter they ſailed for the iſland of Flores, where they refreſhed themſelves; and then putting out again to ſea, came up, the 1ſt of July, with another large carrack of fifteen hundred tons, which, after a few ſhot, they ſummoned to ſurrender. But it ſtanding upon its defence, and, in the engagement with the former carrack, the Vice-Admiral and ſeveral men having been killed, and the Admiral, with many more, wounded, the reſt began to grow faint and diſcouraged. So leaving this carrack, they went and waited about Corvo and Flores, for ſome prize from the Weſt-Indies. None coming, and their victuals beginning to grow ſhort, they returned for England, and arrived at Portſmouth about the end of Auguſt, having done much harm to the enemy, and little good to themſelves (b). Notwithſtanding that, the Earl of Cumberland reſolved upon an eighth expedition in the year 1595. Thinking himſelf ill-uſed by the Queen, in the ſmall ſhare he received of the treaſure found in the Madre de Dios; and not liking to be tied to ſuch ſtrict orders as he was when he went out with any ſhips of the royal navy; likewiſe, being highly diſpleaſed at the loſs of the two laſt-mentioned carracks, for want of a ſufficient ſtrength, he built, at Deptford, a ſhip of his own, of nine hundred tons: which the Queen, at the launching of it, named The Scourge of Malice. It was the beſt and largeſt ſhip, that, till then, had ever been built by any Engliſh ſubject. In this his Lordſhip intended to have gone in perſon, and had prepared three other ſhips to accompany him [L]. But when he had gone as far as Plymouth, the Queen ſent him an order, by Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir John Hawkins, to return; and he complied. The ſhips, however, purſued their voyage [M]: three of them (c) went to the Azores, where they took a carvel from St. Thomas, of a hundred tons, laden with ſugar. They attacked, afterwards, near Flores, a large ſhip, which they ſuppoſed to be a carrack, but found it to be the St. Thomas, Vice-Admiral of the Spaniſh fleet, waiting there to convoy the Eaſt and Weſt-India fleets to Europe. Being like to be overpowered by the Engliſh, it went and joined the other Spaniſh ſhips: all which together were too ſtrong for the Earl of Cumberland's ſmall ſquadron: whereupon, theſe latter ſailed for the coaſt of Spain. Near it they took three Dutch ſhips, laden with wheat, copper, and other ammunitions and proviſions; which being for the King of Spain, were on that account thought lawful prize. By this time their victuals being nearly ſpent, they returned to England (d). In 1596, his Lordſhip fitted out a ſecond time the Scourge of Malice: in which he went in perſon, accompanied with the Dreadnought, belonging to the Queen, and ſome other ſmall ſhips. About thirty or forty leagues from England he met with a ſtorm, wherein the Scourge ſprang her main-maſt, and was made unſerviceable for that voyage: ſo that he was forced to return for England in the Dreadnought (e). The Queen having at that time prepared a large fleet to go on the coaſt of Spain, under the command of the Earl of Eſſex and the Lord Admiral, the Earl of Cumberland thought it proper to ſend alſo thither the Aſcenſion, a ſhip of three hundred tons, four and thirty pieces of ordnance, with a hundred and twenty men, commanded by Captain Francis Slingſby, on purpoſe to wait for ſuch ſhips as were expected from Liſbon. Near the Goodwin Sands it had like to be loſt in a ſtorm: but, however, having been able to proceed to Plymouth, and being refitted there, they proceeded on their voyage. Meeting with a carvel, they made a fruitleſs attempt upon it, in which the Captain was grievouſly wounded. Afterwards they happened to be vigorouſly attacked by ſeven Spaniſh ſhips, one of them the Admiral, againſt which they as vigorouſly defended themſelves. They continued on the coaſt of Spain till they had but fourteen days proviſions left; and then returned to England, without ſo much as one prize to make good the damage and loſs they and the Monſon, was ſo highly diſpleaſed at Captain Langton's being appointed Admiral, and Commander of the Scourge, that he quitted the others, and betook himſelf to his own adventure in the Alcedo. That bred a quarrel, afterwards, between the Earl of Cumberland and him, and it was a long time before they were reconciled (13).

Having then fitted out, and victualled his own ſhip the Scourge of Malice, with nineteen others [N], chiefly at his own charge; he undertook a voyage in perſon to the Weſt-Indies. For that purpoſe, he ſet ſail from Plymouth, March 6, 1597-8; and, on the coaſt of Spain, took a Hamburgh ſhip laden with corn, copper, powder, and prohibited commodities; and a French ſhip laden with ſalt going into Liſbon; but had, in taking the firſt, three men killed, five or ſix wounded, and his ſhip ſhot in ſeveral places. Soon after he received intelligence, that there were at Liſbon five very rich carracks ready to ſail for the Eaſt-Indies, and five and twenty ſhips for Braſil. But they hearing of the approach of the Earl's fleet, and he being tired of waiting for them, ſailed on the 5th of April for the South-Cape. The 8th day they went from thence towards the Canaries; and, on the 13th, made themſelves maſters of Lancerota, where they hoped to have met with a very great treaſure, that iſland being then governed by a Marquis, reputed worth an hundred thouſand pounds, but they found little or nothing in the place (g). On the 21ſt of April, ſailing from Lancerota, they directed their courſe towards Dominica, where they arrived the 23d of May, and ſtaid till the 1ſt of June. Next they went to the Virgin-Iſlands, then uninhabited, where the Earl muſtered his men, and acquainted them with his deſign upon the Iſland of St. Juan de Porto Rico (h). Accordingly, they ſet ſail for that place, where they arrived the 6th of June, and immediately landed the ſoldiers, which were about a thouſand in number. After a very difficult paſſage over a cauſeway to the town [O], and two violent aſſaults, the enemies quitted the place, of which his Lordſhip took poſſeſſion June the 8th (i). Within a few days, the ſtrong fort of Mora, in which were four hundred ſoldiers, ſurrendered alſo to the Engliſh, and was afterwards razed. This town being accounted the very key of the Weſt-Indies, and a paſſage to all the gold and ſilver in the continent of America, his Lordſhip determined to keep it, and make it a place of war. For that purpoſe he ſent away the inhabitants, on the 7th of July, to Carthagena (k), though they made great offers to be permitted to ſtay [P]. But a bloody-flux, that carried off about four or five hundred of his men (l), made him alter his reſolution. In the mean time, a carvel coming, on the 19th of July, into the harbour, from Margarita, with about a thouſand ducats worth of pearl, was ſeized upon by the Engliſh: by which they being informed, that the King of Spain's pearl-cheſt at Margarita was very rich, and but ſlenderly guarded, the Earl of Cumberland ſailed with three ſhips, in order to have that great booty, but was hindered by contrary winds from executing his purpoſe. Before he quitted the Iſland of St. Juan de Puerto Rico, he endeavoured to prevail upon the chief inhabitants for a ſum of money, to ranſom their iſland and city. But finding that they trifled with him, and ſuſpecting ſome treach-

The Merchant Royal, Vice-Admiral, commanded by Sir John Berkley. The Aſcenſion, Rear-Admiral, Captain Robert Flicke. The Berkley-bay, Capt. John Lea. The Old Frigate, Captain William Harper. And two barges uſed for landing of men (14). For this expedition, the Earl was authorized by the Queen's letters Patents dated the 14th of January 1597-8, to raiſe forces ſerviceable by ſea and land: accordingly he levied twelve companies of eighty men each; and appointed officers for them, when he was within one day's ſail of Porto Rico (15). The chief officers were, Sir John Berkley, General; William Meſey, Lieutenant-Colonel; Hercules Folyambe, Serjeant-Major, &c (16).

At the farther end of it, there was a bridge, which had been pulled up, and a ſtrong barricado. Beſides, the cauſeway had been purpoſely made ſo rugged, that the Engliſh could not keep on their feet, and therefore choſe to wade in the water by the ſide of it. To add to their misfortunes, the Earl of Cumberland, by the ſtumbling of him that bore his target, had a violent fall, and was in danger of drowning. For his armour ſo overburdened him, that the Serjeant-Major, who by chance was next to him, had much ado at the firſt and ſecond attempt to raiſe him. When he was up, he found he had ſwallowed a great deal of ſalt-water: which made him ſo ſick, that he was forced to lie down for a while upon the cauſeway; till, being a little recovered, he was able to be led to a place of more eaſe and ſafety (17).

[P] Though they made great offers to be permitted to ſtay.] The Earl, in a letter of his after the taking of this place, affirmeth, That if he would have left the place, he might have had by good account as much ſugar and ginger in the country as was worth 500,000 pounds. But he intended to keep it as the key 'of 'the Indies, which whoever poſſeſſeth (as his words 'were) may at his pleaſure go into any chamber in the 'houſe, and ſee how they ſleepe before he bee either 'ſtopped or deſcried: ſo as they muſt at every doore 'keepe ſo great a force to guard them, as will conſume 'a great part of their yeerely revenue; and ſend it 'from place to place with ſo great a waſtage, as will 'cauſe them to curſe their new Porter: for when 'they have done what they can, they ſhall beare his 'charge to their owne deſtructions, and ſtill be loſing 'places both of ſtrength and wealth (18).'

(18) Ibid. p. 1817.

Ary,

ery, he left the ſtrength of his fleet with Sir John Berkley [Q]; to whom he gave full power and commiſſion to tranſact all affairs in his abſence. He took, for his own part, nine ſhips with him [R]; on board of which he put what hides, ginger, ſugar, and ammunition he could get; the bells of the churches; and all the braſs cannons that were in the iſland, being fourſcore in number. With theſe nine ſhips he ſet ſail, on the 14th of Auguſt, for the Azores, where he hoped to intercept the Spaniſh Mexico fleet; or ſome of the carracks (m). After many tedious calms, and one violent ſtorm, he arrived at Flores on the 15th of September: but, at his coming there, was told, that he came too late. It was in all likelihood much for his ſafety and advantage: for, but a few days before, there had been at that place nine and twenty large Spaniſh men of war, which undoubtedly would have proved too ſtrong for him (n). Here he was joined by Sir John Berkley, with the reſt of his fleet. After having taken in ſome proviſions, they ſailed all together, the 16th of September, for England, where they arrived about the beginning of October (o). In this expedition, his Lordſhip loſt a barge, ſunk by his order in the haven, to the prejudice of the enemy; another barge, caſt away in a ſtorm at Bermudas; the Pegaſus, wrecked upon the Goodwin Sands; and the old Frigate upon the Uſhant; in which two laſt ſhips, forty perſons were drowned. He loſt otherwiſe about ſeven hundred men, whereof ſix hundred died of the bloody-flux and calenture at Porto-Rico; and ſixty were ſlain in fight (p). And, for the vaſt expences he was at in hiring and fitting up ſhips, &c. he got nothing in this voyage, only ſome quantities of hides, ginger, and ſugar, eighty pieces of ordnance, with ſome ammunition, the bells of the churches, and about the value of a thouſand ducats of pearl. It was, however, of conſiderable ſervice to the Engliſh nation, and did great damage to the Spaniards; in that it hindered the carracks from making their voyage to the Eaſt-Indies for this year, and obſtructed the return of the Spaniſh plate-fleet from America (q). By the eleven voyages above-mentioned, and by building of ſhips, horſe-racing, tilting, and the like expenſive exerciſes, this noble Earl waſted more of his eſtate than any of his anceſtors (r). I ſhould have obſerved, that, in 1592, he was elected Knight of the Garter (s). In 1601, he was one of the Lords that were ſent with forces to reduce the Earl of Eſſex to obedience (t). He departed this life at the Savoy, in London, October 30, 1605, and was buried at Skipton, in Craven in Yorkſhire, the 30th of March following; where a fine tomb was afterwards erected to his memory (u). He married Margaret, the third daughter of Francis Earl of Bedford, by whom he had two ſons, who died young; and a daughter named Anne [S]. Dying thus without iſſue-male, he was ſucceeded

 [From ſome papers which have been put into our hands by an ingenious and learned friend, John Baynes, Eſq; Barriſter at Law, we have been enabled to aſcertain, with exactneſs, the place and time of the Earl of Cumberland's birth. He was born at Brougham Caſtle, in Weſtmoreland, on the 8th of Auguſt, 1558. A few particulars concerning him, which were not known to our biographical predeceſſor, have been related by Mr. Pennant, in the ſecond part of his Tour in Scotland. At an audience which the Earl had after one of his expeditions, Queen Elizabeth, perhaps deſignedly, dropped one of her gloves. His Lordſhip took it up, and preſented it to her; upon which ſhe graciouſly deſired him to keep it, as a mark of her eſteem. In this manner his ambition was gratified with a reward that ſuited her Majeſty's avarice. He adorned the glove with diamonds, and wore it in the front of his high-crowned hat on days of tournament. This is expreſſed in the fine print of him, by Robert White. Another inſtance of the Queen's favour to the Earl of Cumberland, was her appointing him her champion in all her tilting matches, from the thirty-third year of her reign. In this office he ſucceeded the gallant old Knight Sir Henry Lea, who reſigned it with much ceremony, in 1590. Mr. Walpole, in his Miſcellaneous Antiquities, has obliged the public with an entertaining account of his Lordſhip's inveſtiture. He excelled all the nobility of his time in the exerciſes of tiltings, turnings, and courſes of the field. His magnificent armour worn on ſuch occaſions, adorned with roſes and fleurs de lis, is actually preſerved at Appleby Caſtle (22). In Skipton Caſtle is a picture of the Earl of Cumberland and his family, which is deemed a curious performance. It is tripartite, in form of a ſcreen. The Earl, who occupies the center, is dreſſed in armour, ſpotted with ſtars of gold; but much of it is concealed by a veſt and ſkirts reaching to his knees: his helmet and gauntlet, lying on the floor, are ſtudded in like manner (23). His Lady ſtands by him in a purple gown, and white petticoat, embroidered with gold. She pathetically extends one hand to two beautiful boys, as if in the action of diſſuading her Lord from the dangerous voyages ſucceeded in his honours by his brother Francis; who deceaſed in 1641, and had for ſucceſſor his only ſon Henry. And he alſo dying the 11th of December, 1643, left one only voyages in which he engaged, when more intereſting and tender claims urged the preſence of a parent. "How muſt he have been affected, ſays Mr. Pennant, by his refuſal, when he found that he had "loſt both on his return from two expeditions, if "the heart of a hero does not too often diveſt itſelf "of the tender ſenſations (24)!" The letters of Margaret, the Earl of Cumberland's Lady, are extant in manuſcript, and alſo her Diary; from which it appears, that ſhe unfortunately married without liking, and met with the ſame return. She complains greatly of the coolneſs of her Lord, and of his neglecting their daughter, Anne Clifford. The Counteſs of Cumberland even endured great poverty, of which ſhe writes in a moſt moving ſtrain to King James the Firſt, to ſeveral great perſons, and to the Earl himſelf. Mr. Pennant obſerves, that all her letters are humble, ſuppliant, and pathetic, though the Earl was ſaid to have parted with her on account of her high ſpirit (25).

(24) Ibid. p. 355, 356.

(25) Ibid. p. 356.

Though this Lady might ſometimes be obliged, from peculiar circumſtances, to write in a ſtrain of humiliation, it is certain that ſhe was a woman who poſſeſſed great fortitude and magnanimity of mind. This is apparent from the account her daughter hath given of her; nor do we perceive, in that account, any traces of the poverty which the letters ſeen by Mr. Pennant repreſent her to have endured. Her conduct, after the death of her Lord, in the conteſt between her and Francis Earl of Cumberland, her brother-in-law, for the family eſtate, was truly ſpirited, as ſhe would never ſubmit to give up her daughter's right. With regard to her quarrel with her huſband, the blame was principally on his ſide, as he was irregular in his manners, and appears, particularly, to have engaged in an amour with a lady of quality. A reconciliation, however, ſeems to have been effected between the Earl and the Counteſs; for ſhe was preſent with him at the time of his deceaſe, and he then expreſſed much affection towards her (26). We learn, from the inſcription on the picture before mentioned, that, during the latter part of his life, he felt the good effects of his early education; for he died penitently, willingly, and chriſtianly (27). It is evident, from all that is related concerning Margaret Counteſs of Cumberland, that ſhe was a woman of a moſt excellent character. Her daughter always manifeſts the higheſt ſenſe of her virtues, ſhews the greateſt veneration for her memory, and ſeldom ſpeaks of her under any other epithet than that of "my bleſſed mother."

This daughter, Lady Anne Clifford, who was ſucceſſively married to Richard Earl of Dorſet, and to Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, and who, at length, by the failure of the male line, poſſeſſed the great hereditary eſtates of the Clifford Cumberland family, has lately become extremely celebrated. What hath brought her ſo much into the public eye, is a letter of her's, which was printed, April the 5th, 1753, in the periodical paper, entitled the "World," N° 14. This letter was addreſſed to Sir Joſeph Williamſon, who, when Secretary of State to King Charles the Second, had written to name a candidate to her for the Borough of Appleby. The brave Counteſs, with all the ſpirit of her anceſtors, and with all the eloquence of independent Greece, returned the following laconic anſwer:

"I have been bullied by an Uſurper, I have been "neglected by a Court, but I will not be dictated "to by a Subject: your Man ſhan't ſtand.

"Anne, Dorſet, Pembroke and Montgomery (28)."

(28) "The World," vol. i. p. 86. Edition of 1772.

Few letters have excited a more general admiration; and the reaſon of it is thus explained by Dr. Campbell, in his Philoſophy of Rhetoric. "We "ſhall find, ſays he, that the very ſame ſentiment "expreſſed diffuſely, will be admitted barely to be "juſt; expreſſed conciſely, will be admired as ſpi"rited. To recur to examples, the famous anſwer "returned by the Counteſs of Dorſet, to the letter "of Sir Joſeph Williamſon, Secretary of State to "Charles the Second, nominating to her a Member "for the Borough of Appleby, is an excellent illuſ"tration of this doctrine.—If we conſider the mean"ing, there is mention made of two facts, which it "was impoſſible that any body of common ſenſe, in "this lady's circumſtances, ſhould not have ob"ſerved, and of a reſolution in conſequence of theſe, "which it was natural for every perſon who had a "reſentment of bad uſage to make. Whence then "reſults the vivacity, the fire which is ſo manifeſt "in the letter? Not from any thing extraordinary "in the matter, but purely from the laconiſm of the "manner. An ordinary ſpirit would have employed "as many pages to expreſs the ſame thing, as there "are affirmations in this ſhort letter. The epiſtle "might in that caſe have been very ſenſible, and "withal very dull; but would never have been "thought worthy of being recorded as containing "any thing uncommon, or deſerving a reader's no"tice (29)."

(29) Philoſophy of Rhetoric, vol. ii. p. 263, 264.

Mr. Pennant characterizes Lady Anne Clifford as the moſt eminent perſon of her age for intellectual accompliſhments, for ſpirit, magnificence, and deeds of benevolence; and he has given a particular deſcription of two portraits of her, in the ſide-leaves of the family picture already noticed. Both the paintings are full lengths; one repreſenting her at the age of thirteen, and the other in her middle age, in the ſtate of widowhood. The books, in the firſt of theſe pictures, inform us of the faſhionable courſe of reading among people of rank in her days. There are among them Euſebius, St. Auguſtine, Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, Godfrey of Boulogne, the French Academy, Camden, Ortelius, and Agrippa on the Vanity of occult Sciences. Above are the heads of Mr. Samuel Daniel, her tutor, and Mrs. Anne Taylor, her governeſs; and this memorial of the inſtructors of her youth, is a moſt grateful acknowledgment of the benefits ſhe received from them. The books in the ſecond picture conſiſt wholly of the Bible, Charron on Wiſdom, and pious Treatiſes, excepting one of Diſtillations and excellent Medicines (30); from which may be collected what were the chief objects of the Counteſs's ſtudies, in the retirement of her later days.

(30) Pennant's Tour, ubi ſupra.

Mr. Walpole, who has given a place to this celebrated Lady, in his Catalogue of noble Authors, repreſents her as having written "Memoirs of her "Huſband Richard Earl of Dorſet;" and "Sun"dry Memorials of herſelf and her Progenitors (31)." With regard to the firſt of theſe articles, we apprehend that he is miſtaken; there having never appeared in the Counteſs's manuſcripts any diſtinct work relative to her firſt huſband, or any other account of him than what is occaſionally to be met with in the Hiſtory of her own Life. The writer of the paper in the "World," before referred to, hath fallen into the ſame miſtake.

(31) Royal and noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 192.

Mr. Baynes hath obliged us with a tranſcript of the original narrative left of herſelf by the Counteſs of Dorſet. The title of the manuſcript is, "A "Summary of the Records, and a true Memorial of "the Life of me the Lady Anne Clifford, who by "Birth being ſole Daughter and Heir to my illuſ"trious Father George Clifford the third Earl of "Cumberland, by his virtuous Wife Margaret Ruſ"ſel my Mother, in right Deſcent from him, and "his long continued noble Anceſtors the Veteri"ponts, Cliffords, and Veſeys, Baroneſs Clifford, "Weſtmoreland, and Veſey, High Sheriffeſs of "Weſtmoreland, and Ladye of the Honor of Skyp"ton in Craven, was by my firſt Marriage Counteſs "Dowager of Dorſet, and by my ſecond Marriage "Counteſs Dowager of Pembroke and Montgo"mery." We muſt confeſs, that the peruſal of this manuſcript has given us very little ſatisfaction. It is written in a manner extremely tedious, abounds with repetitions, and the facts related in it are, for the moſt part, equally minute and unintereſting. Though the Counteſs was undoubtedly a woman of a ſound under-only daughter, Elizabeth, born in 1613, and married July 5, 1635, to Richard Boyle, Viſcount Dungarvan, heir-apparent to Richard Earl of Cork; created, in 1644, Lord Clifford underſtanding, and a great ſpirit, yet her work by no means correſponds with Mr. Pennant's character of her, as the moſt eminent perſon of her age for intellectual accompliſhments. There are few things in it that relate to the general events of the times; and the inſtances of this kind which are to be met with are perfectly inſignificant, being nothing more than the ordinary news of the day; ſuch as the reſtoration and marriage of King Charles the Second, the death of his brother Henry, the coming over of the Queen Dowager to this country, and her return to France, the viſit of the Grand Duke of Tuſcany to England, the deceaſe of the Queen of Bohemia, and the plague and fire of the city of London. With regard to the plague, her Ladyſhip has mentioned, that there died eight thouſand a week, for ſeveral weeks together. Her imagination was principally occupied with every incident, how trifling ſoever, which happened to herſelf, or any of her family. The different places of her reſidence, the time ſhe ſtaid in them, the repairs of her houſes, her journies from one caſtle to another, the marriages of her daughters, the births of her grandchildren and great-grandchildren, the deaths of the great perſons ſhe was connected with, the viſits ſhe received from her noble relations, the way by which they came and returned, the number of nights they lodged with her, the rooms in which they lay, her repeated entertainment of the Judges of Aſſize, and many other particulars of the like nature, are recorded with the moſt circumſtantial exactneſs, and with an uniformity of ſtyle that is very unpleaſant. It will not, therefore, be expected from us, that we ſhould enter into the detail of the Counteſs of Dorſet's and Pembroke's life. Our readers would not thank us for doing any thing more than ſelecting a few paſſages from the manuſcript, which appear moſt deſerving of notice.

The circumſtances reſpecting her being brought into the world, are related with an accuracy which Biographers will never, perhaps, in any other inſtance be able to attain. She informs us, that, through the merciful providence of God, ſhe was begotten by her valiant father, and conceived with child by her worthy mother, the firſt day of May in 1589, in the Lord Wharton's houſe in Channel-Row, in Weſtminſter, hard by the river of Thames, as Pſalm 139; yet that ſhe was not born till the 30th day of January following, when her bleſſed mother brought her forth in one of her father's chief houſes, called Skypton Caſtle, in Craven. Of her own natural accompliſhments, corporal and mental, ſhe has given this account. "I "was, ſays ſhe, very happy in my firſt conſtitution "both in mind and body, both for internal and ex- "ternal endowments; for never was there child "more equally reſembling both father and mother "than myſelf. The color of mine eyes were black "like my father's, and the form and aſpect of them "was quick and lively like my mother's. The hair "of my head was brown and very thick, and ſo long "that it reached to the calf of my legs, when I "ſtood upright; with a peak of hair on my fore- "head, and a dimple on my chin; like my father "full cheeks, and round face like my mother; and "an exquiſite ſhape of body reſembling my father; "but now time and age hath long ſince ended all "thoſe beauties, which are to be compared to the "graſs of the field. Iſaiah 40. 67, 8. 1 Pet. 1. "24. For now, when I cauſed theſe memorables of "myſelf to be written, I have paſſed the ſixty-third "year of my age. And though I ſay it, the per- "fections of my mind were much above thoſe of my "body. I had a ſtrong and copious memory, a "ſound judgment and a diſcerning ſpirit, and ſo "much of a ſtrong imagination in me, as that many "times even my dreams and apprehenſions before- "hand proved to be true; ſo as old Mr. John Den- "ham, a great Aſtronomer that ſome time lived in "my father's houſe, would often ſay, that I had "much in me in nature, to ſhew that the ſweet in- "fluence of the Pleiades and the bands of Orion, "mentioned in that 38th chapter of Job ver. 31, 32, 33, "were powerful both at my conception and nati- "vity." Lady Anne Clifford farther acquaints us, that, by the bringing up of her dear mother, ſhe did, as it were, even ſuck the milk of goodneſs, which made her mind grow ſtrong againſt the ſtorms of fortune, which few avoid that are greatly born and matched. In her infancy and childhood, by the means of her aunt of Warwick, ſhe tells us, that ſhe was much beloved by that renowned Queen Elizabeth. The various perils to which ſhe was expoſed, are thus recorded. "I muſt not forget to acknow- "ledge, that in my infancy and youth, and a great "part of my life, I have eſcaped many dangers, "both by fire and water, by paſſage in coaches, and "falls from horſes, by burning fevers, and exceſſive "extremity of bleeding, many times to the great "hazard of my life; all which, and many cunning "and wicked devices of my enemies, I have eſcaped "and paſſed through miraculouſly; and much the "better by the help of the prayers of my devout "mother, who inceſſantly begged of God for my "ſafety and preſervation. James 5. 16." The following account, which ſhe has given of herſelf, may not perhaps be diſpleaſing to our readers. "I "muſt confeſs, with unexpreſſible thankfulneſs, that "though, through the goodneſs of Almighty God, "and the mercies of my Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, Re- "deemer of the world, I was born a happy creature "in mind, body, and fortune, and that thoſe two "Lords of mine, to whom I was afterwards by the "divine Providence married, were in their ſeveral "kinds worthy Noblemen as any then were in this "kingdom; yet was it my misfortune to have con- "tradictions and croſſes with them both; with my "firſt Lord, about the deſire he had to make me ſell "my rights in the lands of my ancient inheritance "for a ſum of money, which I never did, nor never "would conſent unto, inſomuch as this matter was "the cauſe of a long contention betwixt us, as alſo "for his profuſeneſs in conſuming his eſtate, and "ſome other extravagances of his; and with my "ſecond Lord, becauſe my youngeſt daughter, the "Lady Iſabella Sackvill, would not be brought to "marry one of his younger ſons, and that I would "not relinquiſh my intereſt I had in five thouſand "pounds, being part of her portion, out of my lands "in Craven: nor did there want diverſe malicious "illwillers, to blow and foment the coals of diſſen- "tion betwixt us; ſo as in both their life times, the "marble pillars of Knowle in Kent, and Wilton in "Wiltſhire, were to me oftentimes but the gay ar- "bour of anguiſh, inſomuch as a wiſe man that "knew the inſides of my fortune, would often ſay "that I lived in both thoſe my Lords great families, "as the river of Roan, or Rodanus, runs through "the lake of Geneva, without mingling any part of "its ſtreams with that lake: for I gave myſelf wholly "to retiredneſs as much as I could in both thoſe "great families, and made good books and virtuous "thoughts my companions, which can never diſcern "affliction, nor be daunted when it unjuſtly happens; "and by a happy genius I overcame all thoſe trou- "bles, the prayers of my bleſſed mother helping me "therein."

On the 18th and 20th of January, 1616-17, the Counteſs of Dorſet was brought before King James in Whitehall, to give her conſent to the award which his Majeſty then intended to make, and afterwards performed, concerning all the lands of her inheritance. This, however, ſhe utterly refuſed; for which we are informed, that ſhe was afterwards brought into many and great troubles.

On the 28th of March, 1624, died Richard, Earl of Dorſet, whoſe character his Lady has thus deſcribed: "This firſt Lord of mine was in his own "nature of a juſt mind, of a ſweet diſpoſition, and "very valiant in his own perſon. He had a great "advantage in his breeding, by the wiſdom and de- "votion of his grandfather, Thomas Sackvill, Earl "of Clifford of Lanſborough; and on the 20th of March, 1644, Earl of Burlington, anceſtor of the Earls of that name (w).

" of Dorſet, and Lord High Treaſurer of England, " who was then held one of the wiſeſt men of that " time; by which means he was ſo good a ſcholar in " all manner of learning, that, in his youth, when " he lived in the Univerſity of Oxford, (his ſaid " grandfather being at that time Chancellor of that " Univerſity) there was none of the young Nobility " then ſtudents there, that excelled him. He was " alſo a good Patriot to his country, and generally " well beloved in it; much eſteemed of by all the " Parliaments that ſate in his time, and ſo great a " lover of ſcholars and ſoldiers, as that with an ex- " ceſſive bounty towards them, or indeed any of " worth that were in diſtreſs, he did much diminiſh " his eſtate, as alſo with exceſſive prodigality in houſe- " keeping, and other noble ways at court, as tilting, " maſquing, and the like; Prince Henry being then " alive, who was much addicted to thoſe noble ex- " erciſes, and of whom he was much beloved."

Soon after the Earl's deceaſe, the Counteſs had the ſmall-pox with ſuch violence, that ſhe was brought to death's door; and the diſeaſe ſo martyred her face, that it confirmed more and more her mind never to marry again. This reſolution, however, was changed, by her marriage, in 1630, with Philip, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery; which ſecond marriage, ſhe ſays, was wonderfully brought to paſs by the providence of God, for the croſſing and diſappointage of the envy, malice, and ſiniſter practices of her enemies. The character of this Nobleman, who died in 1650, ſhall conclude our extracts from the Counteſs's Memorials. " He was no ſcholar at all to ſpeak of; " for he was not paſt three or four months at the " Univerſity of Oxford, being taken away thence by " his friends preſently after his father's death, in " Queen Elizabeth's time, at the latter end of her " reign, to follow the Court, as judging himſelf fit " for that kind of life when he was not paſſing fif- " teen or ſixteen years old: yet he was of a very " quick apprehenſion, a ſharp underſtanding, very " crafty withal, and of a diſcerning ſpirit, but ex- " tremely cholerick by nature, which was increaſed " the more by the office of Chamberlain to the King, " which he held many years. He was never out of " England but ſome two months, when he went into " France with other Lords, in the year 1625, to at- " tend Queen Mary, at her firſt coming over into " England to be married to King Charles her huſ- " band. He was one of the greateſt Noblemen of " his time in England in all reſpects, and was " throughout the realm very well beloved."

It is evident from this account of the Earl of Pembroke, with whom the Counteſs lived in a ſtate of diſſenſion, and from whom ſhe was afterwards ſeparated, that he was by no means ſo weak a man as he is repreſented by ſeveral of our writers. Mr. Walpole calls the Earl a memorable ſimpleton, and Mr. Pennant ſtyles him a brutal ſimpleton. But both theſe gentlemen have been miſled, by relying too much on the authority of Butler. Mr. Baynes, in a letter with which he hath favoured us, and which we ſhall probably hereafter have occaſion to make uſe of, hath clearly ſhewn, that Philip Earl of Pembroke was, in various reſpects, a far more conſiderable character than hath commonly been imagined.

The Counteſs's funeral ſermon was preached on the 14th of April, 1676, at Appleby, by Dr. Edward Rainbow, Biſhop of Carliſle. The text choſen by him, in reference to the numerous works of architecture in which ſhe was perpetually employed, was from the Proverbs of Solomon: " Every wiſe woman " buildeth her houſe." The Biſhop hath entered very largely into her character, and in deſcribing the extent of her underſtanding, informs us, that Dr. Donne ſaid of her Ladyſhip, in her younger years, " That ſhe knew well how to diſcourſe of all things, " from predeſtination to flea-ſilk." One of the firſt things ſhe built, was a pillar, in the highway, at the place where ſhe and her mother laſt parted, and took their final farewell (32). She erected a monument to her tutor Samuel Daniel, the poetical hiſtorian, and another to Spenſer (33).

There are no traces, in the Counteſs of Dorſet and Pembroke's Memoirs, of the letter which has rendered her name ſo famous, or of any application to her from Sir Joſeph Williamſon, relative to the Borough of Appleby. CLIFFORD (THOMAS), Lord High Treaſurer of England in the reign of King Charles II. was born Auguſt 1, 1630, at Ugbrook, in the pariſh of Chudlegh, in Devonſhire, about nine miles from Exeter (a). His father was Hugh Clifford, of Ugbrook, Eſq; Colonel of a regiment of foot in King Charles the Firſt's expedition againſt the Scots, in 1639 [A]; and his mother, Mary, daughter of Sir George Chudlegh, of Aſhton, in the county of Devon, Bart. And having paſſed the age of fifty, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity; in which he became ſo great a proficient, that doing all his exerciſes, he took the degree of Doctor in the Univerſity of Oxford; and in that function continued, without accepting any preferment in the Church, but preached gratis all his time; to ſhew others the way of avoiding thoſe rocks whereon he himſelf had in his youth ſometimes run, as he often expreſſed. He died in the year 1634 (2). This gentleman's taking orders, is what probably occaſioned the miſtake animadverted upon in the foregoing note.

[C] Derived his pedigree from the noble family of the Cliffords, Earls of Cumberland.] The founder of this ancient family was William Fitz-punz (3), who came into England with William the Conqueror. His grandſon, Walter, took the ſurname of Clifford from the pariſh of Clifford in Herefordſhire. Deſcended from him, was Lewis de Clifford, who lived in the reigns of King Richard II. and Henry IV. and was the immediate anceſtor of the preſent Lords Cliffords. His great grandſon was Thomas Clifford of Borſcombe in the county of Wilts; whoſe great grandſon Antony Clifford, of Borſcombe aforementioned, and King's Teignton in Devonſhire, married Anne, daughter, and one of the heirs, of Sir Peter Courtenay of Ugbrook, Knt. by which means that eſtate came into the family of the Cliffords. Antony's eldeſt ſon, was Henry Clifford, Eſq; from whom deſcended the Cliffords of Borſcombe and King's Teignton; and by a female heir that eſtate is now come into the family of Bampfield. —— His ſecond ſon was William —— and the third ſon, Thomas, mentioned in the laſt note, had the ſeat of Ugbrook, now enjoyed by the preſent Lord Clifford (4).

of King Henry IV. (c).—Thomas, who is the ſubject of this article, having in his youth had an education ſuitable to his birth and quality, was, on the 25th of May, 1647, admitted Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College in Oxford (d). In 1650, he ſupplicated for the degree of Bachelor of Arts; but whether he was admitted appears not (e). However, after having made ſome conſiderable ſtay in the Univerſity, and well furniſhed himſelf with academical learning, he became a ſtudent in the Middle-Temple, London (f). Having there continued awhile, he travelled into foreign parts, 'being accounted, 'by his contemporaries, a young man of a very unſettled head, or of a roving ſhat-'tered brain (g).' Notwithſtanding that, we are aſſured by Mr. Prince (h), that having an excellent genius, highly improved by education, he returned home a moſt accompliſhed gentleman. In the beginning of April, 1660, he was elected one of the Burgeſſes for Totneſs, to ſerve in that Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter the 25th of the ſame month, and reſtored King Charles II. And, after his Majeſty's reſtoration, he was choſen again Burgeſs for the ſame place, in the Parliament which began the 8th of May, 1661 (i). In this Parliament he began to make a conſiderable figure [D]: for, being a man of great vivacity (k), of a good preſence of mind and body, a ſound judgment, and ready elocution, he became a frequent and celebrated ſpeaker in the Houſe; at firſt againſt, but at length in behalf of, the royal prerogative: for which being taken notice of at Court, he was admitted into the King's favour; and ſoon after received the honour of Knighthood (l). He was one of thoſe Members of the Houſe of Commons, who formed, ſoon after the Reſtoration, the wicked project of raiſing the King's authority, and increaſing his revenue, which was defeated by the honeſt Earl of Clarendon (m). Being a perſon of a bold ſpirit, and martial temper, he attended, in 1665, James Duke of York at ſea, and was in that ſea-fight with the Dutch, which happened on the 3d of June. After this, continuing in the fleet when it was commanded by Edward Earl of Sandwich, Vice-Admiral, he was in the expedition at Bergen, in Norway; when, on the 2d of Auguſt, the Engliſh attacked the Dutch Eaſt-India fleet, which had taken refuge in that port (n). Soon after, he was ſent Envoy to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, with full power to conclude new treaties and alliances with them (o). The next year, 1666, he attended Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle at ſea, in the expedition againſt the Dutch, and was in that great engagement which laſted the four firſt days of June: he was alſo with the ſame Generals on the 25th of July following, in another fight with the Dutch (p). In conſideration of theſe great ſervices, he was, on the 8th of November following, made Comptroller of the King's Houſhold, in the room of Sir Hugh Pollard, Knt. and Bart. who died the day before; and on the 5th of December enſuing, was ſworn one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council (q). The 13th of June, 1668, he was conſtituted Treaſurer of the King's Houſhold, upon the deceaſe of Charles Viſcount Fitz-harding; and, about the ſame time was made, by patent, one of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Treaſury (r). In 1670, he became one of the King's Cabinet-Council, known by the name of the Cabal; who contrived to render the King abſolute; to eſtabliſh Popery, and deſtroy the Proteſtant religion; to break the Triple Alliance, and to make war upon Holland (s): in all which they acted as the tools of France [E]. The next year his Majeſty granted him a ſixty years leaſe of the paſtures of Creſlow, in Buckinghamſhire (t). And the ſame year he finiſhed a new chapel at Ugbrook, which was conſecrated and dedicated to St. Cyprian, by Anthony, Biſhop of Exeter (u). Upon the death of Sir John Trevor, which was on the 28th of May, 1672 (w), and in the abſence of Henry Earl of Arlington, Sir Thomas executed the office of Principal Secretary of State, till the return of the Lord Arlington from his embaſſy in Holland, and of Mr. Henry Coventry from his embaſſy into Sweden (x). For his great ſervices to King Charles II. and his brother the Duke of York, he was, on the 20th of April, 1672, created, by patent, Baron Clifford, of Chudlegh, in the county of Devon, to him and his heirs male; and, in June following, his Majeſty gave him the manors of Cannington, and Rodway Fitz-payn, in Somerſetſhire (y). Moreover, having adviſed King Charles to ſhut up the Exchequer [F], he was, for that important advice, rewarded, on [D] In this Parliament he began to make a conſiderable figure.] When he firſt appeared in the Houſe, he got one to recommend him to the Lord Clarendon's favour; but this Lord, who had many ſpies among the Prieſts, being informed of Clifford's being turned Roman Catholick, excuſed himſelf the beſt he could. So Clifford ſtruck in with his enemies; and tied himſelf particularly to Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington (5).

[E] In all which they acted as the tools of France.] They had all of them great preſents from France, beſides what was openly given them: for the French Ambaſſador gave each of them a picture of the King of France ſet in diamonds, to the value of 3000*l* (6). This conduct of theirs, in making our Court ſubſervient to the deſigns of France, and which, for that purpoſe, rendered even King Charles dependent upon Lewis XIV. was agreeable to the ſentiments of the Lord Clifford in particular; who once ſaid inadvertently, 'That if the King [Charles II.] muſt be 'in a dependance, it was better to pay it to a great and 'generous King [namely Lewis,] than to five hun-'dred of his own inſolent ſubjects (7).'

[F] Having adviſed King Charles to ſhut up the Exchequer.] The occaſion of that advice, was this: The King, under preſſing neceſſities, promiſed the White Staff to any one of his Miniſters, who could put him in a way to raiſe fifteen hundred thouſand pounds, without applying to his Parliament. The next day Lord Aſhley told Sir Thomas Clifford, That there was a way to do this; but it was dangerous, and might in its conſequences inflame both Parliament and people, on the 28th of November, with the moſt profitable office of Lord High-Treaſurer of England, which had been executed by Commiſſioners ever ſince the death of Thomas, Earl of Southampton (z). But being heated with the deſign of bringing in Popery, even to enthuſiaſm (a), he was guilty of ſome indecencies, which occaſioned his loſing ſoon that place: for, in purſuance of his and the reſt of the Cabal's deſigns [G], King Charles having, for the ſervice of Popery, publiſhed, March 15, 1671-2, a Declaration for Indulgence, or Liberty of Conſcience (b), wherein the execution of penal Laws, againſt whatſoever ſort of Nonconformiſts or Recuſants, was ſuſpended; the Houſe of Commons, which began to perceive the King's deſigns, voted that Declaration to be againſt law (c). In oppoſition to this vote, and two addreſſes to the King ſubſequent thereupon, the Lord Clifford reſolved to maintain, in the Houſe of Lords, the validity of that Declaration, with all the force and all the arguments he could bring for it. He began the debate with rough words; calling the vote of the Commons a horrible monſter (d), and running on in a very high ſtrain. He ſaid, in ſhort, all that could be ſaid, with great heat, and many indecent expreſſions (e). Though this ſpeech was agreeable to the King, it raiſed ſuch a flame in the Parliament [H], that the Cabal durſt not purſue their projects; and the Earl of Shafteſbury deſerting them, the King was prevailed upon [I] to recall and cancel his Declaration (f). Thereupon the Lord Clifford was diſgraced [K], and reſigning the White Staff on the 19th of June, 1673 (g), retired to people. Sir Thomas, impatient to know the ſecret, plied the Lord Aſhley with viſits, and having drunk him to a proper height, led him inſenſibly to the ſubject of the King's indigence: Lord Aſhley, warm and unguarded, dropt the important ſecret of ſhutting up the Exchequer. Sir Thomas took the hint, left Aſhley as ſoon as he could, went the ſame night to Whitehall, and attending till the King roſe, demanded the White Staff. The King renewed his promiſe, if the money could be found; and then Sir Thomas diſcloſed the ſecret, and was accordingly made Lord Treaſurer (8). That affair was propoſed in Council January 2, 1671-2 (9).

[G] In purſuance of his and the Cabal's deſigns.] The Lord Clifford, a man of a daring and ambitious ſpirit, took the opportunity of the war with Holland the King was then engaged in, to propoſe the Declaration of Indulgence, that the Diſſenters of all ſorts, as well Proteſtants as Papiſts, might be at reſt, and ſo vaſt a number of people not be made deſperate at home, while the King was engaged with ſo potent an enemy abroad.——This Lord's notion was, That the King, if he would be firm to himſelf, might ſettle what religion he pleaſed, and carry the government to what height he would: for if men were aſſured in the liberty of their conſciences, and undiſturbed in their properties, able and upright Judges made in Weſtminſter-hall to judge the cauſes of Meum and Tuum; and if, on the other hand, the fort of Tilbury was finiſhed to bridle the city, the fort of Plymouth to ſecure the Weſt, and arms for twenty thouſand men in each of theſe, and in Hull for the northern parts; with ſome addition (which might be eaſily and undiſcernedly made) to the force now on foot, there were none who had either will, opportunity, or power to reſiſt (10).

[H] This ſpeech raiſed a great flame in the Parliament.] Upon a diviſion, the Court had the majority. But againſt it about thirty of the moſt conſiderable of the Houſe of Lords proteſted. So the Court ſaw, they had gained nothing in carrying a vote, that drew after it ſuch a proteſtation. Thereupon, it was debated in the Cabinet, what the King ſhould do. Lord Clifford and Duke Lauderdale were for the King's ſtanding his ground. The Lord Clifford in particular ſaid to the King, his people did now ſee through all his deſigns: and therefore he muſt reſolve to make himſelf maſter at once, or be for ever ſubject to much jealouſy and contempt. However, his Majeſty followed the advice of the Earls of Shafteſbury and Arlington, who preſſed him to give the Parliament full content. Whereupon he recalled his Declaration, as is related above (11).

(11) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 348, 349.

[I] The King was prevailed upon, &c.] At firſt, he was all in a fury to be forſaken by his Chancellor, the Earl of Shafteſbury: and told Lord Clifford, how well he was pleaſed with his ſpeech, and how highly he was offended with the other. But, the ſame afternoon in which that affair had been argued in the Houſe of Lords, the Earls of Shafteſbury and Arlington got all thoſe members of the Houſe of Commons on whom they had any influence (and who had money from the King, and were his ſpies, but had leave to vote with the party againſt the Court, for procuring them the more credit) to go privately to the King, and to tell him that upon Lord Clifford's ſpeech, the Houſe was in ſuch fury, that probably they would have gone to ſome high votes and impeachments; but the Lord Shafteſbury ſpeaking on the other ſide, reſtrained them. So they made the King apprehend, that the Lord Chancellor's ſpeech, with which he had been offended, was really a great ſervice done him. And they perſuaded him farther, that he might now ſave himſelf, and obtain an indemnity for his Miniſters, if he would part with the Declaration. This was ſo dextrouſly managed by Lord Arlington, who got thus a great number of the members to go one after another to the King, and by concert to ſpeak all the ſame language, that before night the King was quite changed, and ſaid to his brother, that Lord Clifford had undone himſelf, and had ſpoiled their buſineſs by his mad ſpeech; and that though Lord Shafteſbury had ſpoken like a rogue, yet that had ſtopt a fury which the other's indiſcretion had kindled, to ſuch a degree that he could ſerve him no longer. He gave him leave to let him know all this. Accordingly, the Duke told Lord Clifford what the King had ſaid. The Lord Clifford, who was naturally a vehement man, went upon that night to the King, who ſcarcely knew how to look him in the face. Lord Clifford ſaid, he knew how many enemies he muſt needs make to himſelf by his ſpeech: but he hoped that in it he both ſerved and pleaſed the King, and was therefore the leſs concerned in every thing elſe: but he was ſurprized to find by the Duke, that the King was now of another mind. The King was in ſome confuſion: he owned that all he had ſaid was right in itſelf: but he ſaid, that he, who ſat long in the Houſe of Commons, ſhould have conſidered better what they could bear, and what the neceſſity of his affairs required (12).

(12) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 349, 350.

[K] Thereupon the Lord Clifford was diſgraced.] In his firſt heat he was inclined to have laid down his White Staff, and to have expoſtulated roundly with the King. But a cooler thought ſtopped him; he reckoned he muſt now retire; and therefore he had a mind to take ſome care of his family in the way of doing it: ſo he reſtrained himſelf, and ſaid, he was ſorry that his beſt meant ſervices were ſo ill underſtood. Soon after, he went to the Duke of Buckingham, who had contributed much to the procuring the White Staff to him; and told him, he brought him the firſt notice that he was to loſe that place to which he had helped him, and that he would aſſiſt him to procure it to ſome of his friends. After they had talked round all that were in any ſort capable of it, and had found great objections to every one of them, they at laſt pitched on Sir Thomas Oſborne, created afterwards Duke of Leeds (13). his country-ſeat at Ugbrook: where, in September following, he died of the ſtone, being aged forty-three years, and about a month (h). He was buried in a vault under the chapel he had built, as is related above (i). This Lord's character is ſufficiently evident from what is ſaid of him in this article: but, beſides that, Mr. Prince informs us (k), that he was a gentleman of a proper manly body, of a large and noble mind, of a ſound head, and a ſtout heart. He not only had, but had the command of, moſt excellent parts, and knew how to employ them to his own beſt advantage. He had a voluble flowing tongue, a ready wit, a firm judgment, and an undaunted courage and reſolution. He married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir to William Martin, of Lindridge, in Devonſhire, Eſq; by whom he had fifteen children; and was ſucceeded, in honour and eſtate, by his eldeſt ſurviving ſon George, who, dying in 1690, the title devolved on his brother, Hugh, who departed this life October 12, 1730; and had for ſucceſſor Hugh, who dying March 25, 1732, was ſucceeded by Hugh, the preſent Lord Clifford (l).

 [This is one of the articles which might well have been ſpared by our learned predeceſſors. There was nothing ſo extraordinary either in the abilities or perſonal character of Sir Thomas Clifford, as to entitle him to a place in the Biographia Britannica; eſpecially when it is conſidered, that his political principles and conduct have only handed down his name with eminent diſhonour to poſterity. Mr. Macpherſon, with his uſual predilection for arbitrary maxims and meaſures of government, hath ſpoken with higher praiſe of Lord Clifford than he is entitled to receive (14). He certainly was a man of talents; but his powers were uniformly exerted for the ruin of the civil and religious liberties of his country.

The aſſertion, in note [E], that all the members of the Cabal had great preſents from France, is not true, at leaſt with regard to the Earl of Shafteſbury; neither was that Nobleman privy to the ſecret treaty with the French Monarch, as will ſufficiently be ſhewn in its proper place. There is good reaſon, likewiſe, to believe, that the ſtory told, from Echard, in note [F], and which has found its way into ſo many of our hiſtories, is entirely deſtitute of foundation.] K.

 [CLIVE (Robert), * Baron of Plaſſey, one of the moſt extraordinary characters which this, or any age, has produced, was born at Styche, in the pariſh of Moreton-Say, near Market-Drayton in Shropſhire, on the 29th day of September, in the year 1725. His father, Richard Clive, inherited the eſtate of Styche, the antient poſſeſſion of his family; but thinking the income, which ſcarcely exceeded five hundred pounds a year, too ſmall a proviſion, he followed the buſineſs of the law (a). His mother, Rebecca, was the daughter of Mr. Gaſkell, of Mancheſter. In his early youth he was ſent to a private ſchool, Dr. Eaton's, of Loſtock, in Cheſhire. The Doctor obſerved that, in courage and ſagacity, he far ſurpaſſed his fellows, and diſcerned in the ſchool-boy the character of the future hero. "If," ſaid he, "that lad ſhould live to be a man, and an opportunity be "given for the exertion of his talents, few names will be greater than his."

From this ſchool, at the age of eleven, he was removed to another, of which the Reverend Mr. Burſlem, of Market-Drayton, was the maſter. In that town there ſtands, on the edge of a high hill, an antient Gothic Church, from the lofty ſteeple of which, at the diſtance of a few feet from the top, there projects an old ſtone ſpout, in the form of a dragon's head (b). On this head he once ſeated himſelf, to the great aſtoniſhment and terror of his ſchoolfellows, who were gazing from below (c). Yet he was not inſenſible to danger, nor ever ſought it unleſs when it produced applauſe; but then he flew with eagerneſs to meet it; for even when a boy, he loved honour more than he feared death. From the tuition of Mr. Burſlem, with whom his ſtay was ſhort, he was ſent to Merchant-Taylors ſchool in London. This celebrated ſeminary, however, did not long retain him: for his father reſolved once more to try the effect of a private ſchool, and entruſted him to the care of Mr. Sterling, of Hemel Hempſtead, a village in Hertfordſhire; where he continued till he obtained the appointment of a Writer in the ſervice of the Eaſt-India Company (d).

From a diſlike to reſtraint, and an abhorrence of all compulſion, young Clive's academical attainments ſeldom received, or deſerved, from his maſters, any particular applauſe; but they all agreed in giving him the character of the moſt unlucky boy they ever had in their ſchools. Such were the firſt aſpects of a character, that ſoon afterwards commanded the admiration of the world *!

In conſequence of Mr. Clive's appointment, in 1743, as a Writer in the Company's ſervice, he embarked in one of their ſhips, and arrived at Madraſs in the year 1744, in the nineteenth year of his age. The ſame diſlike to the drudgery of the deſk, the ſame impatience of controul, which diſtinguiſhed him at ſchool, ſtill marked his character, and rendered his appointment as troubleſome to his ſuperiors, as it was irkſome to himſelf. On one occaſion, his conduct to the Secretary, under whom the writers are placed, was ſo inconſiſtent with the diſcipline of office, that the Governor, to whom it was reported, commanded him to aſk the Secretary's pardon. The ſubmiſſion was made in terms of extreme contempt; but the Secretary received it graciouſly, and invited him to dinner. "No, Sir, (replied Clive) the Governor did not command me to dine "with you (e)."

On the ſurrender of Madraſs to the French Admiral, Monſieur de la Bourdonnais, in September, 1746, the Company's ſervants, both civil and military, became priſoners

(b) The writer has heard this anecdote related by ſeveral of the inhabitants of Drayton.

(c) His object was to get a ſmooth ſtone which lay on this projecting ſtone ſpout, for the pleaſure of jerking it.

* After his arrival in India, he devoted his leiſure hours to ſtudy, and became ſo good a Latin ſcholar, that a particular friend of his remembers to have heard him, in 1753, tranſlate an Ode of Horace into very proper Engliſh, extempore.

(e) From the information of Mr. Burman.

on parole. But as Monſieur Dupleix, who was commander in chief of the French forces in India, and who was not preſent at the ſurrender, refuſed to ratify the treaty, and made the Engliſh priſoners to the town, inſiſting upon their taking a freſh parole from the new governor; the Engliſh, on their part, conſidered their engagement to Bourdonnais as broken, and thought themſelves at liberty to make their eſcape, if poſſible, and to take up arms, when occaſion might offer. Accordingly, Mr. Clive, diſguiſed as a Moor in the dreſs of the country, and a few others, eſcaped to St. David's, which lies on the ſame coaſt, at the diſtance of twenty-one miles to the ſouth (f). (f) Ibid.

Soon after his arrival, he happened to be engaged in a party at cards, with two Enſigns, who were detected in a combination to cheat the reſt of the company. The Enſigns had won conſiderable ſums, which, as their knavery was proved, the loſers, at firſt, refuſed to pay: but the threats of the two gamblers ſoon intimidated all but Clive, who ſtill perſiſted in his refuſal, and accepted the challenge, which the boldeſt of them gave. Clive delivered his fire; but his antagoniſt, as each had only a ſingle piſtol, reſerved his, and quitting his ground, preſented the piſtol to Mr. Clive's head, and bid him aſk his life. After ſome heſitation Clive complied; but his antagoniſt telling him he muſt alſo recant the expreſſions he had uſed to his diſhonour, and promiſe payment of the money, for that otherwiſe he would fire; "Fire and be d——n'd (ſaid Clive); I ſaid "you cheated; I ſay ſo ſtill, nor will I ever pay you." The Enſign, finding that all remonſtrances were vain, called him a madman, and threw away his piſtol. When Clive's acquaintance complimented him on his behaviour on this occaſion, he made the following remark. "The man has given me my life, and I have no right in future to "mention his behaviour at the card-table, although I never will pay him, nor ever "keep him company (g)." (g) Ibid.

In 1747, Mr. Clive, being diſguſted with his former ſituation at Madraſs, and weary of an idle life at St. David's, ſolicited, and immediately obtained a commiſſion in the military ſervice. The events of the two firſt years, 1747 and 1748, gave him few opportunities of exerting the talents he poſſeſſed: yet, even in thoſe few, he exhibited ſuch proofs of an ardent, inflexible mind, as raiſed the admiration, and engaged the confidence of the troops. After the capture of Madraſs, the power of the French had obtained the aſcendancy through the whole Carnatic: but the arrival of Admiral Boſcawen with two thouſand regular troops, in July 1748, raiſed the hopes of the government of St. David's, and determined them to retrieve their ſinking reputation, by an attack on Pondicherry, a neighbouring fort, and the enemy's principal ſettlement. At this ſiege our young Enſign diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his gallant behaviour in the defence of the advanced trench, which the enemy attacked with ſo much reſolution, that ſome of the officers in the ſame detachment fell, and he himſelf received a ſhot in his hat, and another in his coat. But notwithſtanding this partial ſucceſs, the early ſetting in of the rains, and the total inexperience of Admiral Boſcawen in military operations, compelled the Engliſh, ſoon afterwards, to raiſe the ſiege, and to return to Fort St. David's (h). (h) Ibid.

During the attack upon the entrenchment, Mr. Clive obſerved that his powder was almoſt ſpent; and in his eagerneſs for more, inſtead of diſpatching a ſerjeant, ran himſelf to the trench behind, and brought a freſh ſupply. This circumſtance was afterwards repreſented to his prejudice by another officer, who inſinuated in company, when Clive was not preſent, that he had quitted his poſt from fear. Clive, informed of the aſperſion, requeſted his friend who brought him the account, to go with him to the officer; when finding that the charge, though denied at firſt, was ſtrictly true, he told the officer they muſt inſtantly withdraw. The officer followed as if to attend him, but whilſt ſome other officers, who were preſent when Clive accoſted him, were ſtill nigh, he gave him from behind a blow upon the ear. Clive inſtantly drew: the other, knowing that the company would interpoſe, followed his example. Both were put under an arreſt, and a Court of Enquiry was ordered, who were of opinion, that the officer ought to aſk Mr. Clive's pardon at the head of the battalion, for having aſperſed his character without a cauſe; but that they might not be obliged to break the officer, they took no notice of the blow. Clive, unwilling to injure the ſervice, was ſilent on this head, till the return of the army to St. David's, when he called on the officer, and reminded him of what had paſſed at the camp. He acknowledged, that with reſpect to that part of the affront on which the Court had given an opinion, their judgment, and the officer's conſequent compliance, had afforded him entire ſatisfaction; but as no notice was taken of the blow, he muſt now call him to an account for that. The officer inſiſted, that his compliance with the opinion of the Court ought to be accepted as a full ſatisfaction, and perſevered in refuſing every other; upon which Mr. Clive laid his cane gently on his head, and told him that he did this merely to ſtigmatize him, for that he was too contemptible a coward even for a beating. The next day the officer reſigned his commiſſion (i). (i) Ibid.

The ſeaſon for military operations being over, the troops remained inactive at St. David's; and before the return of ſpring, the news of a ceſſation of arms between Britain and France arrived. But though the ſubjects of the two ſtates had no longer a national tional pretence for war, yet antient rivalſhip and recent injuries, oppoſition of intereſts, and a mutual conſciouſneſs of ſtrength, ſeemed to announce a ſpeedy renewal of the conteſt. At this time the dominions of a neighbouring chief, the Rajah of Tanjore, were claimed by his brother, a fugitive, who declared, that the preſent Rajah was an uſurper, and that he himſelf, though depoſed by his ſubjects, was their rightful Lord [A].

The

[A] And that he himſelf, though depoſed by his ſubjects, was their rightful Lord.] To enable a writer to deſcribe, with perſpicuity, that part of Lord Clive's life which was paſſed in Hindoſtan, ſome account of the country itſelf appears to be abſolutely requiſite. Such an account will naturally divide itſelf into two parts. 1ſt, A ſhort hiſtorical deſcription of the aborigines of the country, the Hindoos; from whom the name of the country, Hindoſtan, appears to be derived. 2d, A ſhort hiſtorical deſcription of the Mahometan conquerors of Hindoſtan, who ſettled in the country in much the ſame manner, as another branch of that people ſettled in China. The Hindoos (1), or Gentoos, as the Engliſh have named them, are an antient people, perhaps as antient as any now exiſting in the world: they are more antient than the Chineſe; for the antiquities of China are ſaid to be the ſame, or nearly the ſame, with the latter works of Hindoſtan; while the antiquities of Hindoſtan are to be traced to no foreign ſource, and have an obvious relation to the works of their modern times.

(1) This account is collected partly from Halhed, Holwel, Orme, and other writers, and partly from converſations with perſons who were long reſident in the country.

The Hindoos have been divided, from all antiquity, into various tribes; the principal of which are four. The firſt is compoſed of their prieſts, who are alſo their legiſlators. The ſecond is compoſed of the civil officers, and the military men; that is to ſay, of all thoſe who conſtitute the executive power. The third is compoſed of the cultivators of the ſoil, the mechanics, the merchants, and the tradeſmen. The fourth is compoſed of the menial ſervants. It has been thought, rather fancifully perhaps, that in this diviſion the Hindoos have a reference to the four principal parts of the human body; and that the names by which the four tribes are reſpectively diſtinguiſhed, imply the head, the arms, the belly, and the feet.

The firſt tribe, it was obſerved, is compoſed of their prieſts, who are alſo their legiſlators, and is called the tribe of Brahmins. Their ſyſtem of religion is the pureſt Deiſm, and inculcates the pureſt morality; but the ceremonies that accompany its worſhip are ridiculous, and in the explanation of its ſpeculative doctrines, the ſenſe is loſt in the allegory. They believe that the ſoul, after its preſent mode of exiſtence, ſucceſſively animates other bodies, brute or human, according to the merits of its paſt life; but that when it has finiſhed its allotted courſe, it returns to the ſupreme Intelligence, like a drop of water to the boundleſs ocean whence it firſt aroſe. Thus they imagine, that the ſupreme Mind detaches, as it were, a portion of his own ſpirit, to animate ſuch of his works as he chooſes ſhould have life; and that the ſins committed in the human body, are atoned for by the ſufferings that attend the ſucceeding periods of the ſoul's exiſtence, till all pollution being waſhed away, it returns again pure as at firſt, to the univerſal Being. This idea of the tranſmigration of the ſoul, naturally inſpires the people with benevolence, and a ſtrong affection for their ſpecies: for they think they behold the ſpirits of their departed parents, and kindred, in ſome of the people around them; and the uncertainty of the perſons leads them to ſentiments of friendſhip and kindneſs for all.

Such is the religion eſtabliſhed by the Brahmins: their laws will be taken notice of in deſcribing the nature of their government.

The Brahmins have never made thoſe advances in ſcience, which diſtinguiſh the preſent Philoſophers of Europe. Unaccuſtomed to the ſight of any country but their own, they are utterly ignorant of geography; and their knowledge of aſtronomy, though not inconſiderable, (for they have ſufficient to calculate eclipſes) is ſtill inferior to our own. Their ſkill in mechanicks ſeems at preſent to be equally confined; but that in former times their knowledge of the mechanical powers was extenſive, appears from many of their antient buildings. The ſtones which compoſe the gateway of the great Pagoda of Seringham, excite, by their vaſtneſs, the ſame kind of admiration, as that which is produced by the ſtupendous obeliſks of Egypt; and the height to which ſome of thoſe enormous maſſes are raiſed, changes admiration to aſtoniſhment. Their knowledge of metaphyſicks is enlarged: the ſyſtem of the non-exiſtence of matter, which the Biſhop of Cloyne has rendered ſo famous in Europe, is very antient among them; but the Brahmins in general deny the truth of the ſyſtem, for they ſay, if matter does not exiſt, what is it that acts upon the imagination? The imagination cannot act upon itſelf. The Brahmins eat nothing that has life.

The ſecond tribe, as I obſerved before, is compoſed of the military, and the other officers of the executive power. The ſoldiery, in the northern parts of Hindoſtan, are brave and vigorous in war; while thoſe of the ſouthern, enervated as they are by the climate, are leſs capable of manly exertion: hence it has always been difficult to invade this people by the northern frontier. Alexander experienced an obſtinate reſiſtance; and Ghengis Khan, the great conqueror of the Eaſt, was repulſed when, in the year 1300 of our æra, he attempted to ſubdue them. Thoſe, on the contrary, who arriving by ſea, attacked them on the ſouth, were never ſucceſsfully oppoſed. To this tribe the uſe of fiſh, mutton, and veniſon is allowed.

The third tribe, or that of the landed and commercial intereſts, is conſidered as leſs honourable than either of the two preceding. Thoſe of this tribe, who inhabit the interior parts of the country, are juſt and fair in their dealings; but the experience which thoſe on the coaſts have had of that utter diſregard to honeſty and honour, which, of late years, has marked the proceedings of the Europeans towards them, has made them extremely expert in the arts of ſimulation and diſſimulation, the uſual defence of the weak againſt the ſtrong.

The fourth tribe is compoſed entirely of ſervants, who labour, as with us, for a certain ſtipulated pay.

The four tribes have many ſubordinate diviſions.

No perſon can riſe from an inferior to a higher tribe. Hence many individuals of the inferior tribes endeavour, by an appearance of extraordinary devotion, and by the ſeverities of a voluntary penance, to obtain that reſpect to which the Brahmins are entitled by their birth: theſe are called Facquires.

Beſides the four tribes I have mentioned, there is alſo another part of the community: it conſiſts of thoſe who have been degraded from the tribes, or whoſe anceſtors, on their firſt inſtitution, were thought unworthy to be admitted. They are employed in burying the dead, and ſuch other offices as are moſt offenſive to humanity: their touch is ſuppoſed to carry with it a pollution which nothing but death can wipe away: yet for this, as for all offences of a religious kind, atonement may be made by preſents to the Church, and a ready ſubmiſſion to the penances the Prieſts preſcribe.

Such are the diſtinctions which prevail among the Hindoos, and which ſeem to be coeval with their firſt political eſtabliſhments. Their executive government, while they had a government of their own, conſiſted of a chief magiſtrate, who claimed by deſcent; and of many inferior magiſtrates, in whoſe appointment regard was alſo had to hereditary claims. The moſt conſiderable of theſe were the governors of a thouſand towns; ſubordinate to them, and next in rank, were the governors of a hundred towns; and ſubject to theſe were the governors of ten towns, who had alſo under them the governors of five towns; theſe again controuled the governors of three towns, who on their part ſuperintended the governors of two towns; while to them the governor of each ſingle town was in ſome degree reſponſible.

The

The facts appeared to the Engliſh of St. David's ſo convincing, that they applauded their own reſolution to ſupport his cauſe, conſidering it as the cauſe of juſtice, which all men are bound, by the law of nature, to defend. Near their own ſettlement was a fort of the Rajah's, called Devi Cotah, with the attack of which they reſolved to begin their operations. When they appeared before it, they found the approaches difficult, and the ramparts covered with innumerable troops, whoſe military proweſs experience had not yet taught them to deſpiſe. Clive alone inſiſted, that the enterpriſe, though hazardous, was far from being deſperate; for by advancing the cannon in the night, the gates might be deſtroyed, and the town taken by ſtorm (k). The commanding officer, Captain Cope, refuſed to liſten to his advice, as too bold to be followed, and continued a fruitleſs cannonade, till having exhauſted his ammunition, he was compelled to lead back his troops, with diſgrace, to Fort St. David's. Their ſhame at this diſcomfiture, its ill effects upon their trade, and, above all, the triumphs of the French, determined the Engliſh to make a ſecond attempt for the reduction of Devi Cotah. The detachment conſiſted of eight hundred Britiſh troops, and fifteen hundred ſeapoys, a name which is given to the natives when diſciplined by the Europeans, and enliſted in their ſervice. The command was entruſted to Major Lawrence, whoſe great abilities, at that time but little known, ſoon afterwards raiſed him to the higheſt rank in the ſervice. A breach being made in the walls, Clive, then a Lieutenant, ſolicited the

The governors of the larger diſtricts were called Rajahs, or Princes; a name afterwards aſſumed by thoſe of leſs extended juriſdiction. Such was the diſtribution of the executive power. The legiſlative power was compoſed of a council of ten Brahmins, nominated by the chief magiſtrate: they iſſued their ordinances, not as new laws, but as interpretations of the old: for, as their code is of divine original, having been communicated, as is ſuppoſed, by the ſupreme Being, to the inſpired Brahmins of antiquity, it can admit of no improvement or addition.

The laws which conſtitute this code are few in number, and from many circumſtances appear to have been compoſed, when civil ſociety among them was ſtill but young: yet they form a wiſe ſyſtem of juriſprudence.

In the deſcent of property, the male children ſucceed to equal ſhares of the inheritance, and the right of repreſentation takes place; for the ſon ſucceeds to his father's ſhare, in preference to his uncle.

In their criminal code, the puniſhment for almoſt every crime varies with the reſpective ranks; that is to ſay, with the reſpective tribes of the offender, and the party injured. Fines and confiſcation of goods, baniſhment, degradation from the tribe, breaking the bones of the hands and feet, mutilation, crucifixion, and burning, are the puniſhments in uſe among them. To execute Juſtice, is a rule generally obſerved in the pains and penalties preſcribed by their laws; but to execute juſtice in Mercy, is a maxim to which they are ſtrangers.

The Brahmins are exempted from the puniſhment of death; but pains more terrible are often inflicted in its room. Their police is remarkably good. If the magiſtrate does not recover the effects ſtolen, or apprehend the thief, he is obliged to indemnify the ſufferer for his loſs. While their police prevailed there were no robberies.

Such were the Hindoos, the native poſſeſſors of Hindoſtan.

The empire of Hindoſtan had preſerved its independence, its cuſtoms, and its laws, from the earlieſt known period of antiquity, when in the year 1003 of our æra, the Affghans, a nation from the mountains that bound Hindoſtan to the north, made themſelves maſters of the country. The Affghans had been converted very early to the Mahometan faith; and poſſeſſed, in a high degree, that enthuſiaſtic ſpirit for conqueſt, by which the profeſſors of that religion have been ſo often diſtinguiſhed. The native inhabitants, however, preſerved their cuſtoms, religion, and laws; many of the Rajahs were continued in their governments, on condition of their paying a tribute; and though the diſtinction between the Hindoos and the Affghans remained, yet the difference between the conquerors and the conquered was ſoon forgotten.

In this ſituation the empire continued till the year 1398, when Tamerlane, whoſe predeceſſors had attempted the conqueſt in vain, made himſelf maſter of the country. His progreſs, like that of Attila, was every where marked with deſolation. An hundred thouſand priſoners, collected in his march, were maſſacred in cold blood; the greateſt part of the citizens of Delhi, the capital of the empire, were given up to the ſword; while the flames of the burning houſes increaſed the horror of the carnage. Tamerlane returned to Samarcand, the ſeat of his empire, in Tartary, without regarding his conqueſt, or taking any meaſures to preſerve it; but one of his ſucceſſors, Homaion, the ſon of Babr, fixed himſelf in Hindoſtan; and from him all the ſucceeding Emperors deſcended. Among theſe, Aurengzebe, who died in the year 1707, was exceedingly diſtinguiſhed for the greatneſs of his talents, and the uncommon ſplendor of his reign.

This conqueſt of the Tartars differed but little in its effect from the former conqueſt by the Affghans. The Mahometan laws never extended farther than the capital cities, and even there the old cuſtoms were regarded. Two-thirds of the conquered lands were left in the hands of the Rajahs, on conſideration of their paying an annual tribute; and though it is now almoſt eight hundred years ſince the Hindoos firſt loſt their independence, their number exceeds that of the Mahometans, in the proportion of at leaſt ten to one.

From the time that the Tartar government was completely eſtabliſhed in Hindoſtan, its arbitrary power has always been tempered with peculiar mildneſs: for the precepts of the Koran, together with the commentaries on that book, form a code of laws to which the deſcendants of Tamerlane have paid a particular regard. For the more eaſy management of their conqueſt, they divided the empire into diſtricts of great extent, and ſubdivided theſe into provinces: over each diſtrict they appointed a Viceroy, with the title of Subahdar; and over each of the provinces they appointed an inferior officer, with the title of Navob, or Nabob, as it is uſually pronounced by the Engliſh. Subordinate again to the Nabob, there were often many Hindoo Rajahs, whom the Emperors left in poſſeſſion of their reſpective territories, reſerving to themſelves, as mentioned before, an annual tribute. It appears then, that a province formed the government of a Nabob, and that ſeveral provinces united formed the government of a Subahdar.

The power of the Nabob extended to the appointment and diſmiſſion of all the officers, civil and military, of his government, a few only excepted, who received their commiſſions from the Crown. Of theſe few, the principal was the collector of the imperial revenues, called, in the language of the country, the Duan.

Such was the plan of government that prevailed in Hindoſtan, till the late invaſion in the year 1738, by the famons Kouli-Khan. The extreme debility to which he reduced the empire, and the confuſion that took place on his return to Perſia, encouraged the Nabobs to aſſume an independent power.

command of the forlorn hope. Lawrence, though he knew his character, was ſurpriſed at his requeſt, and told him that the ſervice did not fall to his turn. Clive replied, that he knew it did not, he ſhould otherwiſe have claimed it as his right; but that he hoped, on ſuch an occaſion, the requeſt of a volunteer would not be refuſed (l). Major Lawrence having given his conſent, a platoon of four and thirty Britiſh, ſupported by ſeven hundred ſeapoys, was ordered to ſtorm the breach. Clive and the Engliſh led the way. Between the camp and the fort was a rivulet, in paſſing which four of the Engliſh fell by the enemy's fire. The frightened ſeapoys halted as ſoon as they had paſſed the brook; but the Engliſh puſhed reſolutely on, and being now cloſe upon the breach, had levelled their muſkets, when a party of horſe, whom a tower of the fort had hitherto concealed, ruſhed upon their rear, and cut down ſix and twenty of their number. One of the horſemen aimed a ſtroke at Clive; but having eſcaped it, by ſtepping aſide as the horſe paſſed him, he ran towards the rivulet, and had the good fortune to join the ſeapoys. Of the whole four and thirty, himſelf and three others were all that were left alive. Major Lawrence, ſeeing the diſaſter, commanded all the Europeans to advance. Clive ſtill marched in the firſt diviſion. The horſe renewed their attack, but were repulſed with ſuch ſlaughter, that the garriſon, diſmayed at the ſight, gave way as the Engliſh approached the breach, and flying through the oppoſite gate, abandoned the town to the victors (m).

Alarmed at the ſucceſs of the Engliſh, the Rajah ſent them overtures of peace; to which, on condition that a ſettlement ſhould be made on his rival, and the fort of Devi-Cotah, with the adjoining diſtrict, be ceded to the Company, the Engliſh readily agreed.

The war being thus concluded, Lieutenant Clive, to whoſe active mind the idleneſs which, in time of peace, attends a ſoldier's life, was intolerably irkſome, returned to the civil eſtabliſhment, and was admitted to the ſame rank as that he would have held, had he never quitted the civil for the military line. His income was now conſiderably increaſed by his appointment to the office of Commiſſary to the Britiſh troops; an appointment which the friendſhip of Major Lawrence had procured him. He had not long been ſettled at Madraſs, when a fever of the nervous kind deſtroyed his conſtitution, and operated ſo banefully on his ſpirits, that the conſtant preſence of an attendant became abſolutely requiſite *. As the diſeaſe abated, his former ſtrength was in ſome degree renewed; but his frame had received ſo rude a ſhock, that during the remainder of his life, excepting when his mind was ardently engaged, the oppreſſion on his ſpirits frequently returned (n).

* For this complaint, which was attended with a hard ſwelling at the pit of his ſtomach, he went to Bengal, and returned much improved by the cold weather of that climate.

(n) From the information of the family.

The ceſſation of hoſtilities between the Engliſh and the French, had given to the latter an opportunity of executing the important projects they had formed. At that time their affairs were conducted by the renowned Dupleix; a man whoſe ſuperior mind gave courage to the timid, and conduct to the bold; who led the wiſe, and added ſtrength to the efforts of the weak; who rendered all characters and all intereſts ſubſervient to his views, and ſeemed born to be the arbiter of empires. Unſatisfied with the ſlow and precarious aggrandizement which commerce, however flouriſhing, affords, he had formed a plan for the acquiſition of wealth and power, by the ſhorter road of conqueſt. To his penetrating eye, the mutual claims, and various oppoſing intereſts of the native Princes of Hindoſtan, opened the faireſt proſpect of ſucceſs; and nothing remained but to ſelect a proper aſſociate in his ſchemes.

Among the natives of the country, was a man of the name of Chundaſaheb, diſtinguiſhed by the greatneſs of his talents, the celebrity of the part he had acted, and the deſperate ſtate of his fortunes. He had been the confidential Miniſter of a former Nabob of Arcot, who gave him his daughter in marriage; and, truſting to his gratitude, employed him to obtain poſſeſſion of the neighbouring province of Tritchinopoly, the government of which was at that time diſputed by the widow of the late chieftain, and the neareſt of his male relations. Chundaſaheb, by an act of treachery to the widow, obtained, in 1736, poſſeſſion of the province; and, by an act of ſtill greater treachery to his maſter, kept it for himſelf (o). At the end of five years (p) he was dethroned, and taken captive by the Morattoes, who hoped to obtain a conſiderable ranſom for his releaſe, and therefore kept him a priſoner. Six years he paſſed in confinement, during which ſuch revolutions had taken place in the province of Arcot, that the old Nabob, his ſon, and his grandſon, had all of them been ſwept away. A new Nabob, unconnected with the family of the former, had been appointed by the Soubah to the government of Arcot; but the people, diſaffected to his perſon, wiſhed anxiouſly for a change, and carried on a ſecret correſpondence with Chundaſaheb, as the only man whoſe abilities were equal to the conduct of ſo hazardous an enterprize. The talents, the diſtreſſes, and the connections of this man, all recommended him to Dupleix, as the beſt inſtrument of his ſchemes: and, fortunately for him, the Subahdar of the Carnatic, the immediate ſuperior of all its Nabobs, died at this juncture, and left the ſucceſſion in diſpute.

(o) Orme, 3d edition, p. 37, 38, 39.

(p) In 1741.

Dupleix, in the year 1749, directed his colleague, whoſe liberty he had purchaſed from the Morattoes, to inform the youngeſt of the candidates, that the troops of France ſhould ſupport his claims, and ſeat him in his government, provided he would confer on Chundaſaheb the Nabobſhip of Arcot. In purſuance of this ſcheme, the French marched to the aſſiſtance of their new ally, ſtormed the camp of his rival, whoſe death followed his defeat, and proclaimed their favourite, Subahdar of all the Carnatic. In return for theſe ſervices, the Subah conferred on Chundaſaheb the government of Arcot, and ſtigmatized, as an uſurper, the ſon of the laſt Nabob; who, on the death of his father, in a late engagement with Chundaſaheb, had not only aſſumed the title, but had obtained a confirmation from the late rival of the victorious Subah. To Dupleix, he and his ſucceſſor gave, in 1750, the government of all the country on the ſouth of the river Kiſtnah, a province little leſs than France, and appointed him receiver of all the revenues in that diſtrict of the Hindoo empire (q).

(q) Orme, 3d edition, p. 132. 161.

While the French, in this manner, were advancing with haſty ſtrides to the conqueſt of Hindoſtan, and had already obtained ſuch an eminence of power, that all the other Europeans ſeemed but dependents on their will, the Engliſh were plunged in a profound lethargy, forgetful of their intereſt, their ſafety, and their martial fame. Boſcawen had returned to England, and had taken with him almoſt all their troops: Major Lawrence too had left them: Chundaſaheb was in poſſeſſion of the capital of Arcot, and was acknowledged as Nabob by almoſt all the chieftains of the diſtrict; while his rival, and the natural ally of the Engliſh, Mahomed-Alli-Khan, the ſon of the late Nabob, ſtood on the verge of ruin. Happily for our countrymen, the oſtentatious vanity of the French, in 1751, at laſt effected what no regard to intereſt, ſafety, or honour had been able to accompliſh: for the French having marked with white flags, in every field, that part of the crop which belonged to themſelves as collectors of the imperial revenue, the ſight of thoſe flags ſurrounding them on every ſide, and encroaching on their lands, excited the indignation of the Engliſh, and revived their antient hatred (r). They now reſolved to ſupport, with their utmoſt ſtrength, the Nabob's expiring cauſe. But ſuch was their ill-conduct, or their ill-fortune, that they retreated before the enemy, were foiled in every attempt, and ſeemed haſtening to the period of their final and complete deſtruction.

(r) Ibid. p. 171.

Such was the ſtate of the Company's affairs, when Clive reſumed the military character. Being then at St. David's, and having obtained a Captain's commiſſion, he undertook to conduct a detachment ſent to the relief of a fort of the Nabob's, which, at that time, was cloſely beſieged by a neighbouring chieftain, the ally of his rival Chundaſaheb. Led on by him, the Engliſh broke through the chieftain's troops in the night, and entered the fort amid the applauſe of the garriſon. No ſooner had he ſeen them ſafe, than he attempted to return, accompanied by his ſervants, and a guard of twelve ſeapoys: but they had not proceeded far, when they found themſelves ſurrounded by the chieftain's troops. Captain Clive reſolved to force his way, and the attempt ſucceeded; but ſeven of the ſeapoys, and ſeveral of his ſervants, fell by the ſabres of the enemy (s). In the mean time, the important town of Tritchinopoly, the only remaining hope of Mahomed-Alli-Khan, and the only obſtacle to the full eſtabliſhment of Dupleix's and Chundaſaheb's power, was inveſted by a numerous army. Senſible of the urgency of the danger, Clive propoſed to attack the city of Arcot, the capital of the province, as the only means of ſaving Tritchinopoly. His advice prevailed; for in times of danger and diſtreſs, pride and envy naturally ſubſide, and ſuperior minds obtain their juſt aſcendancy. But ſuch was the exhauſted ſtate of the Company's affairs, that two hundred Europeans, and three hundred ſeapoys, were all that the united ſtrength of St. David's and Madraſs were able to ſupply. The firſt intelligence which the garriſon received of their approaching danger, was given them by ſome horſemen, who reported that they had ſeen the Britiſh army marching, with great unconcern, through a tremendous ſtorm of lightning and thunder. Panick-ſtruck with an account which impreſſed their ſuperſtitious minds with more than uſual dread, they ſurrendered the town, and its adjoining fort, without the leaſt reſiſtance (t).

(s) Orme, 1ſt edition.

(t) Orme, 3d edition, p. 183.

Captain Clive immediately iſſued a proclamation, giving to all who choſe to quit the fort, full liberty to take with them whatever they poſſeſſed, excepting proviſions and military ſtores; and declaring, that for theſe the utmoſt value ſhould be paid. A conduct ſo generous, and ſo very unuſual in the wars of Hindoſtan, engaged the affections of the people; and in the ſiege which ſoon afterwards enſued, enabled him, by their means, to procure the moſt certain intelligence of the enemy's deſigns (u).

(u) From the information of the family.

The news that the fort of Arcot was in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, produced the effect which Captain Clive foreſaw; for Chundaſaheb diſpatched his ſon, at the head of a numerous army, the engineers of which were French, to retake the place. The fort was more than a mile in circumference; the works were in a ruinous condition; and the whole garriſon fell ſhort of five hundred men: but their greateſt diſtreſs aroſe from the ſmall number of their cannon, which determined Clive to ſtorm a battery of the enemy's, and bring away the guns. The firſt part of the attempt ſucceeded; for not-withſtanding the efforts of the French, the battery was ſeized by the detachment, which he himſelf commanded; but the miſcarriage of a ſecond party, that was to have co-operated with him, rendered it impoſſible to bring the guns away.

In this attempt fifteen of his Europeans fell, and among them Lieutenant Trenwith. This brave officer, obſerving a ſeapoy at a window taking aim at Clive, pulled him on one ſide; on which the ſeapoy changed his mark, and ſhot the Lieutenant dead. The place was now completely inveſted; and the enemy's guns were ſo admirably ſerved by the engineers Dupleix had ſent, that the number of the beſieged was ſoon exceedingly reduced. Three ſerjeants, who, at different times, ſingly accompanied Captain Clive in viſiting the works, were killed cloſe by his ſide (w); and at length the defences of the fort were ſo much injured, that two breaches were made, one of which was thirty yards in extent. Intelligence was now received, that the next morning, at day-break, the enemy were reſolved to ſtorm the fort, and an account was alſo brought of all their diſpoſitions. Chundaſaheb's troops, intoxicated with opium, and therefore inſenſible to danger, crowded to the breaches, where the garriſon were ſo prepared to receive them, that they encountered certain death. Diſheartened by the greatneſs of the ſlaughter, and alarmed with a report that ſix thouſand Morattoes were approaching, the enemy raiſed the ſiege after it had continued ſeven weeks, and had reduced the number of the garriſon, who were fit for ſervice, to eighty Europeans, and a hundred and twenty ſeapoys (x). Having received a reinforcement, Captain Clive left a garriſon in the fort, and took the field with two hundred Europeans, ſeven hundred ſeapoys, and a thouſand Morattoe horſe, part of a detachment, which the Mahomed-Alli-Khan had purchaſed to ſupport his now-reviving cauſe. With theſe troops the Captain defeated an army of three hundred Europeans, two thouſand five hundred ſeapoys, and two thouſand horſe, which Dupleix and Chundaſaheb had ſent againſt him; and before the end of the campaign, he had made himſelf maſter of ſeveral forts belonging to the enemy.

(x) Ibid. p. 195.

Early in the next year, (1752) Captain Clive took the field with three hundred and eighty Europeans, two thouſand ſeapoys, and two thouſand five hundred horſe; and finding that the enemy intended an attack on Arcot, haſted to its relief. The enemy, who had intelligence of his motions, had formed a plan to ſurpriſe him on his march; and having with them a numerous party of French, had taken their meaſures with ſo much judgment, that before he ſuſpected an attack, the fire of nine pieces of cannon, at the diſtance of two hundred and fifty yards on his right, was poured upon his men. The extremity of danger increaſed the activity, but never diſturbed the compoſure of his mind. The battle hung in ſuſpenſe till evening, when a detachment of his troops attacked the enemy in the rear, and having made themſelves maſters of their cannon, a general defeat enſued (y).

(y) Orme, p. 211, 212.

Arcot, the capital of the province, being now in ſafety, Captain Clive received orders to conduct his forces to St. David's, it being reſolved to ſend them to the relief of Tritchinopoly. Before their departure from St. David's, Major Lawrence arrived from England, and took upon him the command of all the troops which were deſtined for this ſervice, and which conſiſted of four hundred Europeans, and eleven hundred ſeapoys. When they arrived within ſight of the town, the enemy, whoſe detachments had attempted, without ſucceſs, to intercept them on their march, determined to give them battle. Clive, at his own requeſt, took poſſeſſion of a large ſtone building which ſtood on the plain between the two armies, and which the French, intent on forming their line, had happily neglected. This movement decided the fortune of the day: for as the French were expoſed to the fire from the guns, while his troops were protected from theirs, they ſoon gave ground, and the horſe in Chundaſaheb's ſervice, diſmayed by the loſs of their commander Allum Khan, whoſe head was taken off by a cannon-ball, fled with great precipitation. The ſiege of Tritchinopoly being raiſed, the army was divided into two bodies, and Clive, though the junior Captain, was appointed to the command of one; for the Morattoes, and the reſt of the Indian allies of Mahomed-Alli-Khan, declared their reſolution to follow no other leader. Major Lawrence's corps remained on the ſouth of the river Caveri, while Captain Clive proceeded a day's march to the northward, and encamped a few miles beyond the banks of the Coleroon. Soon after the ſeparation, he received intelligence that a large reinforcement, under the conduct of D'Autueil, had been ſent from Pondicherry, by Dupleix, to the relief of the French troops on the Coleroon, who were commanded by Mr. Law. This detachment Clive reſolved to intercept; but finding that D'Autueil had retired on his approach, he returned again to his camp. In the mean time, Mr. Law, who had received an account of his departure, but had not heard of his return, had ſent a party of ſeven hundred ſeapoys, and eighty Europeans, forty of whom were deſerters from the Engliſh, to ſtorm the camp, which he imagined they would find very weakly defended. The advanced guard, deceived by the language of the deſerters, and by the darkneſs of the night, ſuppoſed them a detachment of Major Lawrence's troops, and allowed them to paſs without moleſtation or enquiry. In this manner they marched on to the center of the camp, where, being challenged by the centinels, they inſtantly gave their fire. Clive, ſtarting from his ſleep, imagined the fire had proceeded from his own troops, who, for ſome unknown reaſon, had taken the alarm. With this idea impreſſed upon his mind, he ran to the quarters of the Engliſh, and found them under arms in conſequence of the fire, but as ignorant as himſelf of the cauſe. He proceeded with them to that part of the camp where they heard the alarm, and finding a body of ſeapoys firing at random towards the enemy's encampment, he concluded, as before, that they were his own men, and ordering the Europeans to halt, proceeded towards the ſeapoys, to enquire the reaſon of their conduct. One of the firſt he accoſted, knowing from his language that he was an Engliſhman, wounded him in two places, and then ran towards a Pagoda, or Indian Temple, which ſtood in the camp, and of which the French were maſters. Captain Clive, ſtill miſtaking the ſeapoy for one of his own troops, and enraged at his inſolence, followed him to the gate of the Pagoda, where, to his great ſurpriſe, he was challenged by ſix Frenchmen. This circumſtance inſtantaneouſly ſuggeſted to his mind all that had paſſed. He told them, with a calmneſs which gained belief, that he was come to offer them their lives, on condition of their inſtantly laying down their arms; a propoſal which he imagined they would gladly accept, as they would ſee that the Pagoda was ſurrounded by his troops. Three of the Frenchmen returned to conſult their companions, while the other three accompanied him as his priſoners. He then haſtened to the Europeans, with an intention to attack the ſeapoys; but they, alarmed at their ſituation, had marched away unmoleſted by the Engliſh, who imagined that they had left their ground in obedience to Captain Clive's commands. Having taken ſuch meaſures as muſt effectually prevent the eſcape of the French from the Pagoda, Captain Clive, at the dawn of day, went down in perſon to parley with them. Being weary with fatigue, and weak with the loſs of blood, he leaned for ſupport on the ſhoulders of two ſerjeants, when one of the deſerters, who knew him, fired at him as he ſtood at the gateway, and killed the two ſerjeants who ſupported him (z). The French, fearful that ſuch an outrage, if countenanced by them, would exclude them from the hope of quarter, threw down their arms and ſurrendered. The ſeven hundred ſeapoys, with an appearance of better fortune, had left the camp, but the Morattoes being ordered to purſue them, executed their commiſſion with ſuch effectual ſlaughter, that before noon, not a ſingle man of the whole ſeven hundred was left alive. On returning to his quarters, Captain Clive diſcovered that the fire of the ſeapoys, when they were firſt challenged in the centre of the camp, had ſhattered a box which was under his feet, and killed a ſervant who was ſleeping by his ſide (a). The enemy, weakened by their loſs, were driven from two of their poſts; and ſoon afterwards D'Autreuil, and his whole detachment, were taken priſoners. This rapid ſucceſſion of misfortunes entirely diſheartened Chundaſaheb's Indian troops, and produced ſo great a defection, that two thouſand of his horſe, and fifteen hundred of his ſeapoys, deſerted to Captain Clive; and ſo many thouſand others returned to their different homes, that the troops which remained with him, excluſively of the French battalion, amounted only to three thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Thus abandoned, the unfortunate old man, with the concurrence of Mr. Law, the commanding officer of the French, threw himſelf on the mercy of the chief of the Tanjorines, who was then in Major Lawrence's camp, and who had ſolemnly ſworn to convey him in ſafety to the French ſettlement at Karical. No ſooner was Chundaſaheb in his power, than the faithleſs Tanjorine acquainted Mahomed-Alli-Khan with the news, who immediately inſiſted that the priſoner ſhould be given up to him. The Morattoes, and the regent of Myſore, made the ſame demand, each inſiſting on his preferable right; till at length the Tanjorine, wearied with their importunity, alarmed at their threats, and enraged to be diſappointed of the vaſt advantage he expected from his perfidy, ordered one of his ſervants, a remorſeleſs Affghan, whom he kept for ſuch purpoſes, to diſpatch the unhappy priſoner (b). A few days before this event, Mr. Law's whole French battalion capitulated, and were made priſoners (c).

to

There being now no army to oppoſe him in the field, Captain Clive returned to Madraſs, where he accepted the command of five hundred new-raiſed ſeapoys, and a hundred raw recruits from Europe, none of whom had ever ſeen an enemy. Yet with theſe men he beſieged, and made himſelf maſter of two ſtrong forts, garriſoned by French and natives; for he inſpired them with courage, by expoſing himſelf to the hotteſt of the fire; and his own knowledge and experience ſupplied the deficiency of theirs. This ſervice being completed, and the enemy diſpoſſeſt of all that part of the Carnatic, Captain Clive returned to Madraſs, and continued there till the month of February, 1753, when the ruined ſtate of his health compelled him to embark for England (d).

Whoever reflects on the circumſtances which mark the military life of this extraordinary hero, will not be ſurpriſed that the number of men, whom hiſtory has recorded as the authors of revolutions in empires, ſhould be ſo extremely ſmall. For of thoſe who poſſeſs that ardent courage, that commanding genius, that unconquerable mind, which are requiſite for great exploits, how few are the perſons whoſe ſituation will permit

(z) As it may, perhaps, be difficult to conceive how one ſhot ſhould deſtroy his two ſupporters, and leave him unhurt, Mr. Arch-deacon Clive mentioned this difficulty to Lord Clive, who anſwered, that the two men on whoſe ſhoulders he leaned were ſhorter than himſelf, and were both of them in the line of the ſhot, his own body being ſo much behind as to be out of the line.

mit ſuch talents to produce their natural effects? And of thoſe few, how very ſmall muſt be the number, who eſcape the perils to which their caſt of character generally leads them!

Upon Captain Clive's arrival in his own country, he was received by the Eaſt-India Company with all that affection and eſteem which his extraordinary actions deſerved. As a mark of their gratitude for his ſervices, they requeſted him to accept of an elegant diamond-hilted ſword. This, however, he declined, unleſs the ſame preſent ſhould be made to Colonel Lawrence, which was accordingly done. The ſwords coſt ſeven hundred pounds each (e).

(e) From the information of the family.

Not long after Captain Clive's return to England (f), he was ſolicited by the Directors of the Eaſt-India Company, to accept the appointment of Governor of Fort St. David, with a right of ſucceſſion to the government of Madraſs: and as he expreſſed his willingneſs to ſerve them, they procured for him the commiſſion of Lieutenant-Colonel in his Majeſty's ſervice; together with the conduct of three companies of the Royal Artillery, and of three or four hundred of the King's troops (g).

(f) In 1755.

(g) Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, who went to Hindoſtan the year before, as Engineer-general to the Company, had been appointed to the command of theſe troops, but he died before their arrival. See Orme, p. 406.

With this force he was ordered to join the Morattoes on the weſtern coaſt of Hindoſtan; and, in conjunction with them, to attack the French, whoſe power was at that time extremely formidable to the company. But finding, on his arrival at Bombay, that the peace was already concluded, he determined to employ his troops againſt Angria, a neighbouring Pirate, whoſe frequent depredations were injurious to the Engliſh ſettlements (h). This reſolution he communicated to Admiral Watſon and Sir George Pocock, who were then at Bombay; and as their judgments coincided with his own, the expedition was immediately undertaken, and was attended with complete ſucceſs. But though the original plan was his, and though, as commander in chief of the land-forces, he had alſo a very diſtinguiſhed ſhare in its execution, yet the prize-money was divided among the captors, by a rule that entitled the Colonel to no more than every Captain of a ſhip received. Admiral Watſon, indeed, would have given the ſame ſhare to him as to Sir George Pocock; but, with ſingular diſintereſtedneſs, the Colonel declined the offer (i).

(i) Ibid.

Having thus performed the only ſervice in his power on the weſtern coaſt of Hindoſtan, the Colonel ſailed for Fort St. David, of which he was Deputy-Governor, and arrived there in April, 1756; but his ſtay was ſhort: for, in the following Auguſt, in conſequence of the capture of Calcutta, and of the ruinous ſituation of the Company's affairs in that their principal ſettlement, he was ſummoned to Madraſs, where he was appointed to the command of the troops which were ſent from thence to the relief of the Engliſh in Bengal (k).

(k) Ibid.

On the death of Allaverdee Khan, Nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Oriſſa, in April, 1756, the government deſcended to his nephew Surajah-Dowlah, a young man of turbulent paſſions, of great ambition, and ſtill greater avarice. A wiſh to diſtinguiſh himſelf by ſome uncommon exploit, and a deſire to gratify his ruling paſſion, by a ſeizure of the wealth which the Engliſh factors, eſpecially thoſe of Calcutta, were reported to poſſeſs, induced him, without cauſe or plauſible pretext, to attack their different ſettlements.

By much the greateſt part of the wars that have ariſen between the Europeans and the natives of Hindoſtan, are undoubtedly to be attributed to the injuſtice and rapacity of the former. But, in the preſent inſtance, the war appears to have proceeded from no other cauſe, than the violent and vicious character of the young Nabob (l). The factories of Dacca and Coſſimbuzar were taken without reſiſtance. Calcutta, though conſidered as utterly untenable, was defended for a few days; after which, the Nabob's troops broke into the town, and ſuch of the inhabitants as could not eſcape to the ſhips, were either put to the ſword, or were taken priſoners. Of the latter, a hundred and fifty (of whom many were wounded) were confined, on the night after the ſurrender, in a ſmall cloſe dungeon, where heat, and the ſtench of putrid wounds, where thirſt, ſuffocation, deſpair, and madneſs, produced ſo frightful a mortality, that when the ſun roſe, no more than twenty-two of the hundred and fifty were left alive (m).

On the 15th of December, the Colonel embarked on board Admiral Watſon's ſquadron, having with him twelve hundred ſeapoys, and ſeven hundred Europeans, two hundred and fifty of whom were in his Majeſty's ſervice (n). He arrived in Ballaſor Road in the beginning of December, and in conjunction with the Admiral, determined on an attempt which was conſidered as ſingularly daring, but which, in their circumſtances, was highly expedient; that of bringing up the ſhips to the very town of Calcutta. No ſooner was this ſervice performed, than the troops were landed, and the ſhips guns were brought to bear upon the fort, from which, as well as from the town, the enemy fled with great precipitation (o).

The ſatisfaction of the army and navy in this important ſucceſs, was diſturbed by a difference which aroſe between their reſpective commanders: for the government of the fort being claimed by Captain Coote, in conſequence of a commiſſion from the Admiral, Colonel Clive reſented the demand as highly irregular; Mr. Watſon's authority as

Admiral, giving him no right to ſuperſede the commander in chief of the land-forces, and appoint an inferior officer to the government of the fort. Hence the Colonel refuſed to reſign the command of the fort to Captain Coote, and threatened that officer with an immediate arreſt, if he preſumed to diſobey; but he declared, at the ſame time, that he would give up the fort to Admiral Watſon, if he himſelf would demand the keys. The Admiral ſent him word, in anſwer to this declaration, that if he did not quit the fort, he ſhould be driven from it by the ſhip's guns. The Colonel replied, "that he could not be anſwerable for the conſequences, but he would not quit the fort." His firmneſs induced the Admiral to adopt the expedient of aſking in perſon for the keys, which were accordingly delivered to him, and by him were entruſted, not to Captain Coote, but to the Governor and Council of Calcutta (p). (p) Ibid.

Colonel Clive had now with him twelve hundred ſeapoys, and ſeven hundred Europeans, which were all his force, for a conſiderable part of the Madraſs detachment was not yet arrived. With theſe troops, however, few as they were, he took the field, in 1757, and entrenched himſelf at five miles diſtance from Calcutta, to which town he knew that the Nabob, and his whole army, were then upon their march. The Nabob paſſed the Engliſh entrenchments at the diſtance of but a mile and a half, and encamped at the back of Calcutta (q). (q) Ibid.

The Colonel now found his ſituation truly deſperate. The terror of the Nabob's approach had frightened moſt of the natives from his camp; and, to the apparent impoſſibility of effecting any thing with his ſeven hundred Europeans, was added the proſpect of diſtreſs by famine. He thought it, therefore, adviſeable to ſend two of his friends to the Nabob, to treat for peace: but their return convinced him, that the Nabob was fixed in his hatred to the Engliſh, and would not negotiate, excepting with a view of gratifying that hatred in the ſureſt manner, and by the eaſieſt means. In this ſituation, which ſcarcely preſented a ray of hope, Colonel Clive determined to attack the Nabob's camp, to ſeize his cannon, and, above all things, to carry deſtruction to his head quarters. With this view he applied to Admiral Watſon for the aſſiſtance of five hundred ſeamen, to draw his cannon, and carry his ammunition; and theſe being ſent, he began his march at midnight: but as the day approached, ſo thick a fog came on with it, that, though he had reached the camp, it was no longer poſſible to execute the deſign of ſeizing the cannon, or of proceeding, by the ſhorteſt road, to the head quarters. Yet he ſtill continued the enterpriſe, and paſſed through the midſt of the camp. Of this attack, the Colonel himſelf, in a letter to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, gave the following account:

"May it pleaſe your Grace,

"THE countenance your Grace was pleaſed to ſhew me when in England, has em-
"boldened me to addreſs a few lines to your Grace, on the ſubject of the Eaſt-India "Company.

"No doubt your Grace has been acquainted with the capture of the town of Cal-
"cutta, and of Fort-William, by the Moors, the principal ſettlement in the kingdom "of Bengal, and of the utmoſt conſequence to the Eaſt-India Company. To give "your Grace ſome idea of the richneſs of the place, the loſs of private property only "is valued at more than two millions ſterling.

"When this unfortunate news arrived at Madraſs, the Preſident and Council applied "to Vice-Admiral Watſon, for his aſſiſtance in recovering the Company's rights, pri"vileges, and poſſeſſions, in the province of Bengal; and for the purpoſe, ordered a "large body of land-forces to embark under my command; and I have the pleaſure to "inform your Grace, this expedition, by ſea and land, has been crowned with all the "ſucceſs that could be wiſhed.

"The town of Calcutta and Fort-William were ſoon re-taken, with ſeveral other "forts belonging to the enemy; and, laſt of all, Hughly, the ſecond city in the Ben"gal Nabob's dominions. This news brought down the Nabob, or Prince of the "country, at the head of twenty thouſand horſe, and thirty thouſand foot, twenty-five "pieces of cannon, with a great number of elephants. Our little army, conſiſting of "ſeven hundred Europeans, and twelve hundred blacks, armed and diſciplined after
"the Engliſh manner, lay encamped about the diſtance of five miles from the town of "Calcutta. On the 3d of February, the Nabob's army appeared in ſight, and paſt
"our camp at the diſtance of a mile and a half, and encamped at the back of the town,
"about the like diſtance from Fort-William. Several parties of horſe paſſed within "four hundred yards of our advanced battery, but as we entertained great hopes of "peace from the Nabob's promiſes, we did not fire upon them.

"On the 4th, agreeably to the Nabob's deſire, I diſpatched two gentlemen to wait "upon him, in hopes every thing might be ſettled without drawing the ſword; but the "haughtineſs and diſreſpect with which he treated them, convinced me that nothing "could be expected by mild meaſures. This determined us to attack his camp in the "night-

" night-time; for which purpoſe, I applied to Vice-Admiral Watſon for five hundred " ſailors, to draw our cannon, &c. which he very readily complied with; and, at three " o'clock in the morning, our little army, conſiſting of ſix hundred Europeans, eight " hundred blacks, ſeven field-pieces, and the ſailors above-mentioned, ſet out for the " attack. A little before day-light we entered the camp, and received a very briſk " fire. This did not ſtop the progreſs of our troops, who marched through the ene- " my's camp upwards of four miles in length. We were more than two hours paſſing, " and what eſcaped the van was deſtroyed by the rear. We were obliged to keep up " a conſtant fire of artillery and muſketry the whole time. A body of three hundred " horſe made one gallant charge, and were received with ſo much coolneſs by the mili- " tary, that few eſcaped. Several other briſk charges were made upon our rear, but " to no manner of purpoſe. We returned ſafe to camp, having killed, by the beſt " accounts, thirteen hundred men, and between five and ſix hundred horſe, with four " elephants. The loſs, on our ſide, amounted to two hundred men killed and wounded, " including ſoldiers, ſailors, and blacks. This blow had its deſired effect; for the " next day the army decamped, and the Nabob ſent me a letter, offering terms of ac- " commodation.

" I have the pleaſure of acquainting your Grace, a firm peace is concluded, greatly " to the honour and advantage of the Company. The Nabob has entered into an al- " liance, offenſive and defenſive, and is returned to his capital of Muxadavad (r)."

(r) Manuſcript communicated by the family.

Such is the modeſt, unaffected manner, in which this great man relates an exploit that hiſtory can ſcarcely parallel. His reluctance to ſpeak of himſelf, would not permit him to mention, in this narrative, his Secretary's having been wounded, and his Aid-de-Camp killed by his ſide; though he takes notice of both theſe circumſtances, in a letter to his father.

No ſooner was the treaty ſigned, than Colonel Clive, notwithſtanding the Nabob's interference, and repeated threats, led his force againſt the French ſettlement at Chandernagore, and with the aſſiſtance of the fleet, made himſelf maſter of the place.

This ſucceſs of the Engliſh left them little to fear from the future operations of the French; but they had much to dread from the reſentments of Surajah-Dowlah: for they had attacked the French in oppoſition to his will, and in contempt of his threats to declare himſelf their enemy, if they preſumed to diſobey. Of his rooted antipathy to the Engliſh, his conduct had exhibited a continued proof: the ruins of Calcutta were before their eyes, and the horrors of the night, which followed the ſurrender, were freſh in every mind. He had then received no provocation; he had now received the greateſt. No hope, therefore, of laſting peace remained, but by depriving him of the power to injure; and that could only be effected by a revolution in his government.

The firſt idea of ſuch a change was ſuggeſted by Colonel Clive; and to him, and to Mr. Watts, the execution was entruſted (s). The ſituation of the Nabob's court was highly favourable to their wiſhes: for his conduct had ſo entirely alienated the affections of his principal officers, that one of them, Meer Jaffier by name, became their aſſociate in the enterpriſe; and it was ſoon agreed, that if ſucceſs ſhould attend their views, his maſter's titles, dignity, and power, ſhould be transferred to him. The conduct of this negotiation neceſſarily required the aſſiſtance of one of the natives of the country; for no European could have the ſame acceſs to Meer Jaffier, or have paſſed unſuſpected between him and the Engliſh. The perſon made choice of was a Gentoo Merchant at Calcutta, whoſe name was Omichund, and who was well known to the officers of the Nabob's court, as well as to the Engliſh. He was accordingly employed, and by his aſſiſtance the terms of the agreement were eaſily adjuſted. But before the actual ſigning of the treaty, when ample proofs of the particulars of the plot were in his power, he determined to draw from his ſituation much larger advantages than any which had yet been offered. He, therefore, inſiſted on a moſt enormous ſum, in addition to that which had been promiſed him; and threatened, that in caſe of refuſal, he would go to the Nabob, and diſcloſe to him all he knew (t).

(s) Firſt Report from the Select Committee on India affairs, anno 1772.

The life of Meer Jaffier was in Omichund's hands: the life of Mr. Watts, who was then at Muxadabad, the capital of Bengal, was equally in his power: the intereſts of the Company, and perhaps its exiſtence, were at ſtake. In ſuch circumſtances, to refuſe the demand was impoſſible; and to comply with it, and reward the traitor, was an indignity, to which Colonel Clive could not be induced to ſubmit. In this dilemma, he projected the expedient of ſigning a real and a fictitious treaty. The real treaty contained the different ſtipulations agreed on by Meer Jaffier, and the repreſentatives of the Company, but nothing more; whereas the fictitious treaty contained, beſide thoſe ſtipulations, an article in favour of Omichund, which granted to him the enormous ſum he had demanded, as the price of ſecrecy. Both the agreements were ſigned (u); but the laſt being the only one of which Omichund had any knowledge, he renounced his threatened treachery (w).

(u) Ives's Journal, p. 25, 26.

(w) Firſt Report of the Select Committe, and Lord Clive's ſecond ſpeech.

The arrangement being now made, the Engliſh began their march, in full expectation of being joined at Cutwa by Meer Jaffier and his ſon, who had promiſed to meet them there, there, with a conſiderable force. But inſtead of an army, they found letters from Meer Jaffier, to inform them that the Nabob had ſuſpected his deſign, and had compelled him to ſwear on the Koran, that he would not act againſt him: he added, however, that he was ſtill determined to join his forces to the Engliſh, as ſoon as the armies ſhould engage. The ſituation of the Colonel, and of thoſe he commanded, was now extremely embarraſſing. They received an account from the Nabob's camp, that Meer Jaffier had betrayed them, and that their whole deſign was known. To retreat would be productive of the moſt pernicious effects to the Company, probably of ruin. To advance would be perilous in the extreme; for the river on which they lay, was fordable but in a ſingle place; and ſhould they croſs it, they would have to march the diſtance of many miles before they could reach the enemy. There would then be no retreat, and of courſe ſhould they loſe the battle, the inevitable deſtruction of every individual muſt enſue (x).

(x) Firſt Report of the Select Committee on India affairs.

Full of ſolicitude for the preſervation of the Company, and of thoſe whoſe lives were committed to his care, the Colonel ſummoned a council of war. It was the only one he ever called, and he was afterwards known to ſay, that if their advice had been followed, it would have proved the deſtruction of the Company (y).

The Council reſolved, that the army ſhould not paſs the river: but notwithſtanding this reſolution, the Colonel ordered the troops to croſs over, early in the morning, and marched with ſuch expedition, that in the evening of the next day, he arrived at the Grove of Plaſſey, in the neighbourhood of which the Nabob and his whole army were encamped. The Engliſh took poſſeſſion of the Grove, and retiring behind the bank, with which it was ſurrounded, waited the return of day. The riſing ſun diſcovered to their view the camp of the Nabob extended over all the plain. Fifty thouſand foot, eighteen thouſand horſe, and fifty pieces of cannon, compoſed his force: while their own fell ſhort of three thouſand two hundred men, of whom the Europeans did not exceed nine hundred (z). In conſequence of this exceſſive diſparity of ſtrength, Colonel Clive reſolved, that during the day his operations ſhould be all defenſive; but that at midnight, at which time the united powers of ſleep and opium produce, among the Hindoos, a general ſtupefaction, his troops ſhould ſtorm the camp. For the preſent, therefore, he made no other diſpoſitions than thoſe that were requiſite to repel the enemy's aſſaults. Two ſucceſſive nights and days he had paſſed without repoſe; for he ſhared the fatigues and dangers of his troops, much more conſtantly than he ſhared their reſt. Now, therefore, that all precautions had been taken, and that a ſhort interval ſeemed likely to precede the enemy's attack, he threw himſelf on the ground, and from that tranquillity of mind which never left him, was ſoon aſleep. While, in this manner, the Britiſh General ſlept undiſturbed on the perilous edge of battle, the Nabob was ſitting penſive and ſilent in his tent, revolving in his mind the doubtful iſſue of the conteſt. When he caſt his eyes towards the countleſs multitudes that ſpread themſelves around him, he ſeemed aſſured that danger could not reach him; and, confident of victory, indulged his proudeſt thoughts. But when the remembrance of the ſlaughter with which Clive had formerly filled his camp, forced itſelf upon him, apprehenſions the moſt terrible took poſſeſſion of his mind. During this gloomy reverie, his attendants had withdrawn, one after another, to the outſide of the tent. The Nabob ſtarted to find himſelf alone, and exclaimed, with horror, "Surely they have ſeen me dead (a)." His artillery was now brought to bear upon the Grove, and a heavy cannonade immediately enſued: but the Engliſh, protected by the bank, ſuffered very little from the fire, while their own carried deſtruction through all the Nabob's lines. The Nabob had committed the conduct of the battle to a man of approved fidelity, and diſtinguiſhed reſolution; but while this brave commander was encouraging his troops to advance upon the Engliſh, and drive them from their poſt, he fell to the ground, a headleſs trunk. Terrified with the news, the Nabob ſent for Meer Jaffier to his tent, and throwing down his turban, ſaid to him, with great emotion, "Jaffier, that turban you muſt "defend (b)." Meer Jaffier repeated his former proteſtations of fidelity, and then withdrew to diſpatch a meſſenger to the Engliſh, informing them of the confuſion that prevailed among the Nabob's troops, and ſtrongly adviſing them to ſtorm his camp in the night. In the mean time, accounts were brought to the Nabob, that the havoc of his troops increaſed, but that the Engliſh ſtill continued in the Grove. This laſt circumſtance ſuggeſted to his mind the deſign that Clive had formed; for which reaſon he reſolved to march back to his capital, where an aſſault in the night might be repelled with much more eaſe than it could be in an open camp. No ſooner had Colonel Clive diſcovered, from their movements and the ſlackning of their fire, that the enemy were preparing to retreat, than he led a detachment of the Britiſh againſt a battery on his left, and driving away a party of French who defended it, turned the guns upon the Nabob's troops. Their retreat was inſtantly converted to a confuſed and precipitate flight; but the Engliſh having no horſe, were unable to purſue. The victory being gained, Meer Jaffier ſent a meſſage to the Colonel, to ſay, that he himſelf, and a conſiderable part of the army, waited his commands, and ſoon afterwards came in perſon to pay him his reſpects. He made many apologies for his former conduct, and ſubmitted to his compaſſion, both his fortune and his life. The Colonel aſſured him, that the Engliſh would religiouſly obſerve the treaty they had made. He adviſed him, at the ſame time, to employ the troops he commanded, in the purſuit of the defeated enemy; and ſaid, that he himſelf would follow with the Engliſh forces (c).

(c) Report from the Select Committee on India affairs.

In the mean while, the unfortunate Nabob had fled to his capital, and was employed, during the night, in diſtributing his treaſures among the principal officers of his army; to induce them, if poſſible, to try the fortune of another engagement. Whilſt he was thus employed in fruitleſs endeavours to ſecure their attachment, an account was brought him, that Meer Jaffier and his troops had entered the town, and were marching directly to the palace. Terrified at the news, he made his eſcape through one of the windows, in hopes of finding ſome place of concealment in the neighbourhood of the city. But ſo entirely bereft of friends was this unfortunate youth, that he could think of no one from whom he could aſk protection in this his uttermoſt diſtreſs, except a Prieſt, whoſe noſe and ears, by his orders, had formerly been cut off (d). The Prieſt, too reſentful for the paſt injury to be appeaſed by this mark of preſent confidence, gave him up to a brother of Meer Jaffier's; of which Meer Jaffier's ſon was no ſooner informed, than he commanded the executioner to do his office (e).

(e) Ibid.

Early the next morning, Meer Jaffier waited on Colonel Clive, to apologiſe for the conduct of his ſon, and to repreſent it as the effect of neceſſity. He, at the ſame time, invited the Engliſh, who were encamped without the walls, to make their entrance into the city of Muxadabad. This city the Colonel himſelf deſcribes as containing as many inhabitants as the city of London, ſome of whom are poſſeſſed of fortunes, beyond compariſon greater than any which are found in the capital of the Britiſh empire. So ſmall was the number of the Engliſh, that the people might have deſtroyed them with clubs and ſtones, as they marched along the ſtreets (f): yet the inhabitants conſidered their lives and fortunes as wholly in their power, and offered ſuch immenſe ſums to Colonel Clive, as the condition of ſecurity, as would have enabled him, had money been his object, to have gratified his largeſt wiſhes (g). But the Nabob had made him a preſent of two hundred and ten thouſand pounds, at the ſame time that he had diſtributed largeſſes among his own officers: and though that preſent was trifling in value, when compared to the offers which were made Colonel Clive by the citizens of Muxadabad, (offers which correſponded with the cuſtom of the country, and which they expected would not have been refuſed) yet he thought that the ſecuring of private property to its owners, was an act of juſtice which ought not to be purchaſed with a bribe (h). The preſent from the Nabob he conſidered in a different light: for being given from choice, at a time too when ſimilar preſents were made by him to his own officers, the receiving it was no injury to the giver: nor was it an injury to thoſe in whoſe ſervice he was engaged, ſince every deſirable advantage was already obtained for them, and ſince they would not have received more, if he had received leſs (i).

(i) Ibid.

Meer Jaffier being now perſuaded that his power was completely eſtabliſhed, formed a deſign of governing, without the aſſiſtance of thoſe to whom he owed his elevation (k). But before he entered on his plan, he determined to remove all danger of rivalſhip from the family of the depoſed Nabob; for which reaſon he ordered the brother of the late Surajah-Dowlah to be put to death (l). Thus ſecure, as he thought, he took the field, in order to quell, without the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, three different rebellions which had ariſen in different parts of the country [B]. But when, as the time of action approached, he weighed his own ſtrength againſt that of his enemies, he ſhuddered at the probable event, and ſolicited Colonel Clive to grant him his farther aid. The Colonel accordingly joined him, and two of the three rebels were ſoon entirely ſubdued: but the third, being a man of conſiderable influence, and poſſeſſed of the government of an extenſive and powerful diſtrict, the Colonel thought the intereſts of the Company would be beſt promoted by ſuch an accommodation between the Nabob and this inſurgent, as would leave the latter in poſſeſſion of his power, and enable him, with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, to prevent the execution of thoſe ambitious deſigns which the Nabob had evidently formed (m).

The peace of the country being now ſettled, the Nabob fulfilled the engagements he had made with Colonel Clive, for granting a compenſation to the Company for the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the capture of Calcutta. Nor was compenſation made to the

[B] In order to quell, without the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, three different rebellions which had ariſen in different parts of the country.] The Nabob, feeling his own ſtrength, thought he did not want the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, and ſaid that he ſhould ſuppreſs the rebellion himſelf. This was on the Colonel's repreſenting to him the danger of the undertaking. Colonel Clive acquieſced, and withdrew his forces, under the idea of their being ſoon wanted again, when the Nabob had drawn himſelf into a ſcrape. At this juncture, the officers of the Engliſh army urged the Colonel to compel the Nabob to take other meaſures, and to keep him in ſubjection. To this ſolicitation, Colonel Clive returned the following anſwer: "We ſhall always be able to relieve him in "his diſtreſſes. But let him feel them firſt, and call "upon us; and this will be the way to ſecure his "adherence. If we compel him, he will conſider "us as his tyrants, and ſoon get out of our hands. "But whilſt he thinks us his friends, and beſt ſup-"porters, we may depend upon his attachment (2)."

Company only, but to the Engliſh Merchants and inhabitants, and alſo to the Armenians. Scarcely was this buſineſs compleated, when four gentlemen in the Company's ſervice arrived at Calcutta, and brought with them a commiſſion to act as governors in rotation; each being allowed to retain his authority, for no more than the ſhort term of four months. The nature of this appointment, which, at all times, muſt have been highly inconvenient, was, in the preſent ſtate of the country, ſo obviouſly impolitic, that the very perſons in whoſe favour it was made, were unwilling to accept the truſt, and unanimouſly requeſted that Colonel Clive, who alone, in their opinion, ſeemed equal to the office, would act as governor, and exerciſe the authority intended to be conferred on them. The members of the council having alſo joined in this requeſt, the Colonel accepted the appointment, which (as ſoon afterwards appeared) had already been conferred on him, in conſequence of the battle of Plaſſey, by the Court of Directors in England (n).

In the mean while, an account arrived that Madraſs was beſieged by the French, who, at that time, were commanded by General Lally. In conſequence of this information, Governor Clive directed Colonel Ford to drive the French, if poſſible, from the provinces called the Four Northern Circars; the revenues of which were computed at four hundred thouſand pounds per annum, and conſtituted their chief reſource (o). During the abſence of Colonel Ford, and of half the army, on this expedition, Governor Clive was haſtily ſummoned to Patna, at that time beſieged by the ſon of the Great Mogul, who had formed a deſign of reducing, by force of arms, to his father's government, the now independent provinces of the antient Hindoo empire. In this expedition, the Governor had an opportunity of ſaving the life of the Nabob, who, but for his interference, would have periſhed in a mutiny of his troops. After this Mr. Clive raiſed the ſiege of Patna, and drove the Prince from the province (p).

On his return to Calcutta, he was informed that the Dutch were preparing to invade Bengal, with a formidable force; and the truth of this intelligence was ſoon confirmed by the arrival of ſeven Dutch ſhips, with eight hundred Malays, and ſeven hundred Europeans (q).

A variety of circumſtances induced him to believe, that the Nabob himſelf, who had repeatedly written to the Governor of Batavia, had invited this army to accompliſh the deſtruction of the Engliſh. Now if this ſhould prove to be the caſe, it was evident that the danger was great and immediate: nor was it eaſy to form a plan that ſhould ſecure the Company, without expoſing the commanding officer to the moſt imminent hazard; for he could not commence hoſtilities againſt a nation with whom the Engliſh were at peace, without ſubjecting his life and fortune to the riſk of a deciſion in a court of law. The hardſhip of Mr. Clive's ſituation was ſtill farther increaſed, from the circumſtance of his having remitted, by the Dutch Company, two-thirds of his whole fortune, which, in caſe he ſhould attack them, they would probably retain (r). He determined, however, that all regard to private ſafety, and to private intereſt, ſhould give way to public conſiderations. He called, therefore, upon the Nabob to fulfil his engagements with the Company, and iſſue his commands, that the Dutch ſhould inſtantly quit the river. The Nabob reluctantly complied; but as the Dutch, relying on his former aſſurances of friendſhip, not only diſregarded his orders, but landed their troops, and proceeded on their march towards the factory at Chinſura, the Governor reſolved, in the name, and under the ſanction of the Nabob, to attack them without delay. He gave the command, in this perilous ſervice, to Colonel Ford *, who was now returned from his laſt expedition, in which he had been completely ſucceſsful. The Colonel had with him three hundred Europeans, eight hundred ſeapoys, and one hundred and fifty of the Nabob's horſe, a force much inferior to that of the Dutch. Yet ſuch was the ability with which the Colonel conducted the enterprize, that, of the whole Dutch army, only fourteen arrived at Chinſura (s). The Dutch ſhips were attacked by three of the Company's veſſels, fitted out for the purpoſe; and after an engagement of ſeveral hours, five of the number were taken. The two others alſo were afterwards captured by ſome of the Company's ſhips, that were lower down in the river.

* Ford, in great doubt, ſent to Clive for orders. Clive, who was playing at cards, took a pencil, and wrote on a bit of Ford's letter; "Dear Ford; fight 'em immediately; I'll ſend an order of Council to-morrow." This was a great mark of his ability and firmneſs of mind.

(z) The letter to tart, pu Vanſitt rative, p. 80.

The Dutch were now ſo effectually humbled, that they readily agreed to pay all the expences of the war; on which condition their ſhips and effects were reſtored to them. They alſo conſented to two different treaties, the terms of which were dictated by the Governor; the one with their rivals the Engliſh Company; the other with the Nabob; in which laſt it was ſtipulated, that they ſhould not enter his country again with an armed force, without his conſent; and that in all their ſettlements in Bengal, Bahar, and Oriſſa, no more than a hundred and twenty-five Europeans ſhould at any time be employed (t).

The ability, the courage, and the good fortune of the Governor, had impreſſed the people of Hindoſtan with ſentiments of veneration towards him: but in the mind of Meer Jaffier, whoſe life he had ſaved, that veneration was accompanied with a ſenſe of gratitude and perſonal eſteem. Hence Meer Jaffier prevailed on the Emperor (who at that time was a priſoner of ſtate in Delhi, but who was ſtill conſidered as the fountain of honour) to to confer on the Governor the dignity of Omrah, or Noble of the empire (u); and, according to the cuſtom of the country, he himſelf beſtowed on him, for the ſupport of this ſplendid title, a grant of an ample revenue. This revenue, which amounted to twenty-eight thouſand pounds per annum, conſiſted of the quit-rents paid by the Company, for the lands they held in the neighbourhood of Calcutta (w).

The peace of the Company's ſettlement was no ſooner completely eſtabliſhed, by the treaties with the Dutch, than the Governor ſailed for England, where he arrived in the year 1760. His arrival was welcomed by the warmeſt acknowledgments of the Company; by the general applauſe of his countrymen; and by the ſtrongeſt approbation of his Sovereign, who conferred upon him, on the firſt of December, in the year 1761, the dignity of Baron in the kingdom of Ireland, by the title of Lord Clive, Baron Plaſſey, in the county of Clare. But while his friends and the public paid him their various congratulations, they ſaw, with concern, that his health was irrecoverably loſt; and even the hopes they entertained, that his reſidence in England might gradually leſſen, though it could not entirely remove the baneful effects of the Indian climate, were but of ſhort continuance: for the troubles which aroſe in the Company's ſettlements, in leſs than three years from his departure, appeared ſo truly alarming, that the Directors, with the earneſtneſs of men who had ſcarcely another hope, beſought him to return to India. The cauſe of their alarm, and the objects of the extenſive commiſſion with which they inveſted their favourite, will beſt appear from an account of the events which, ſince his departure, had taken place in the Company's principal ſettlement.

At the time that he left Calcutta, Mr. Vanſittart, whom the Company had appointed to ſucceed him, not being arrived, the government devolved on Mr. Holwell. The Nabob, unhappily for his own intereſts, did not conſider Mr. Holwell as inveſted with the dignity, though he exerciſed, for a time, the powers of a Governor; nor could he feel the ſame attachment to his perſon, or the ſame veneration for his talents, as he had done for thoſe of Mr. Holwell's great predeceſſor. This difference in the Nabob's feelings, produced a difference in his conduct that offended Mr. Holwell, and excited mutual ill-will (x).

The pernicious effects of this reciprocal diſguſt, appeared ſoon afterwards, on a very important occaſion. For the ſon of the Great Mogul, notwithſtanding his ill ſucceſs in the preceding year, having invaded the Nabob's dominions, and laid ſiege to the city of Patna, the Nabob and his army encamped at a diſtance from the Engliſh, and refuſed to co-operate with them. This conduct of the Nabob, though the enemy was ſoon repulſed, increaſed the reſentment of the Engliſh; and the death of his ſon, who was killed in his tent by a ſtroke of lightning, having bereft him of his beſt ſupport, a ſcheme for depoſing him was formed (y).

(y) Ibid. and Vanſittart's Narrative.

Such was the ſituation of affairs when Mr. Vanſittart arrived at Calcutta, and ſucceeded to Mr. Holwell's reſentment, as well as to his place. Nor was it long before the project of transferring the government from Meer Jaffier to his ſon-in-law, Coſſim-Alli-Khan, was carried into actual execution.

The Nabob's injuſtice and cruelty to his ſubjects, were alledged by the Engliſh, as the reaſon of this indecent and arbitrary meaſure. But the Nabob himſelf, who juſtly aſſerted that the Engliſh were not his judges, attributed their conduct to a very different motive. "How much (ſaid the unfortunate old man, addreſſing himſelf to Vanſittart) "how much has my ſon-in-law promiſed to give you for depoſing me? I will give you "twice the ſum to continue me in the government."

No ſooner was the authority of the new Nabob acknowledged by his ſubjects, than the power of the Engliſh, to which he owed his elevation, became the object of his fears. Independently too of the future hazard, the preſent intereſts of his government were deeply affected: for the revenue that was deſtined for the ſupport of his own dignity, and for the defence of his people, was daily and hourly diminiſhed, and that too in a rapid progreſſion, by the violence and frauds of the factors, and other ſervants of the Company (z).

To explain the nature of this grievance, to which the troubles that enſued may truly be aſcribed, a retroſpect to an earlier period will perhaps be requiſite.

When the Engliſh were firſt permitted to eſtabliſh a factory in the province of Bengal, they were conſidered, by the Governor of the province, as a trading people, whoſe commerce was beneficial to the country, and highly advantageous to the revenue. Hence they received the ſame protection, and were ſubject to the ſame occaſional impoſitions, as the Armenians, the Dutch, and other Merchants, who traded with the people of the empire. Their ſecurity was of courſe precarious; the indulgences they obtained were of uncertain continuance; and the extortions of the revenue officers were frequent and exceſſive. At length, however, they had the good fortune to obtain a fixed and legal eſtabliſhment: for, having ſent an Embaſſador to the Court of Delhi, in the year 1716, they procured, though at a vaſt expence, an imperial edict for the free importation and exportation of goods, upon condition of a ſmall annual acknowledgment to be paid to the Royal Treaſury at Hughly (a).

(a) See the original firmaun in Vanſittart.

This privilege of exporting and importing all goods, without the payment of the duties impoſed by the country government, was extended by the Directors to their different ſervants. And though the privilege, as enjoyed by the Company, as well as its ſervants, was ſtrictly confined to imports and exports, (for it did not extend to the inland trade) yet, during the weakneſs that prevailed in the latter part of Meer Jaffier's adminiſtration, the Company's ſervants, in trading on their own account, extended the ſame privilege, with great injuſtice, to all the articles of home conſumption; among which were ſalt, beetle-nut, and tobacco (b). Hence the Engliſh traders, and ſuch of the Hindoos, as purchaſed of the Engliſh the right of buying and ſelling, engroſſed the commerce of the country.

(b) See Lord Clive's firſt Speech.

Coſſim-Alli-Khan ſaw, with indignation, his Merchants ruined, and his revenue converted to a means of raiſing the fortunes of a few obſcure individuals, the ſervants of a company of foreign Merchants. He, therefore, reſolved, and this reſolution he communicated to the Governor, that as his cuſtoms were ruined, his own ſubjects ſhould be admitted to a ſhare in the benefit which exemption from taxes gave, and the trade of the country be equally free to all (c). This determination, however equitable, armed againſt the Nabob the ſelf-intereſt of every ſervant of the Company, and produced in the Council a reſolution to depoſe him, and reinſtate Meer Jaffier in the government.

(c) See the Nabob's letter in Vanſittart's Narrative.

Hoſtilities were ſcarcely begun, when the Engliſh factory at Patna, not two hundred in number, ſupported by two thouſand five hundred ſeapoys, attacked the inhabitants of that great city in the night, and made themſelves maſters of the place. But having diſperſed in purſuit of plunder, they were aſſaulted in the morning by the Nabob's troops, and being driven out of the city, were ſurrounded and made priſoners. The triumph of the Nabob was ſhort: for the Engliſh troops, commanded by Major Adams, defeated him in ſeveral engagements, and obliged him to fly for protection to Sujah-ul-Dowlah, who governed the neighbouring province of Oude. Before his flight, the Nabob, exaſperated to madneſs with this ſudden, and to him incredible ruin, gave orders that the Engliſh, who were taken priſoners in the neighbourhood of Patna, and whoſe number was ſtill a hundred and fifty, ſhould be maſſacred; a commiſſion which a German, who had deſerted from the Company, executed with the cooleſt deliberation (d).

(d) See the firſt Report from the Select Committee, and Vanſittart's Narrative.

Sujah-ul-Dowlah, the Nabob of Oude, had now drawn his army together, and, attended by Coſſim-Alli-Khan, waited the attack of the Engliſh.

At the very time that the Nabob of Bengal ſolicited and obtained the ſupport of Sujah-ul-Dowlah, it happened that the late Emperor's ſon, who had now ſucceeded to the titles of his father, but who was ſtill a fugitive, had taken refuge in the ſame hoſpitable court; and, on this occaſion, attended his benefactor to the field.

The engagement ended in the total defeat of Sujah-ul-Dowlah. He was compelled to ſue for peace: Coſſim-Alli-Khan wandered as a fugitive till his death: and the Emperor threw himſelf on the protection of the Engliſh (e).

(e) Firſt Report from the Select Committee on India affairs, anno 1772.

This was the ſituation of affairs in May 1765, when Lord Clive, and four of his friends, whom the Directors had aſſociated with him, arrived at Calcutta. Their powers were ſo extenſive, that, during the continuance of the troubles, they were commiſſioned to act with the full authority of Governor and Commander in Chief. Their commiſſion ſuperſeded every other, and rendered them ſupreme in the Company's ſettlements in India. The principal objects recommended to them, were, Firſt, The adjuſtment of all diſputes with the country powers: and, Secondly, The reformation of the many abuſes which prevailed among the Company's ſervants, both in the military and civil departments (f).

(f) Ibid. and Lord Clive's Speeches.

For the accompliſhment of the firſt point, Lord Clive thought it neceſſary to oppoſe the ſentiments of ſome of the Council at Calcutta, who wiſhed to transfer to the Emperor, all the dominions of his former benefactor, Sujah-ul-Dowlah, Nabob of Oude. For he was well convinced, that ſuch an eſtabliſhment could not long be ſupported, without the conſtant aſſiſtance of a Britiſh army; as the people, attached to their immediate Sovereign, were neither from intereſt, nor opinion, diſpoſed to transfer their allegiance: whereas the reſtoration of Sujah-ul-Dowlah would not only prevent the ruinous expence of ſupporting a tottering government, but would likewiſe preſerve the Company from the burthen of defending their frontier againſt the hoſtile attacks of the Morattoes. Hence the treaty was concluded on the following terms:

I. An eſtabliſhment was provided for the Emperor, by conferring upon him as much of the province of Oude, as annually yields a revenue of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; in addition to which ſum, the Company agreed to pay him three hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds per annum.

II. The remaining part of the province of Oude was reſtored to the Nabob Sujah-ul-Dowla.

III. The Company engaged to pay to the Nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Oriſſa, an annuity of ſix hundred and ſixty-two thouſand five hundred pounds, to enable him to defray the expence of the military and civil eſtabliſhments.

IV.

IV. The Emperor conferred on the Company the right of collecting the imperial revenues, in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Oriſſa (g).

(g) See the treaty with the Nabob, and the Emperor's Firmaun, in the Appendix to the third Report of the Select Committee.

Thus it appears, that the whole revenue of the three provinces, excepting the payment of three hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds to the Emperor, was, in fact, reſerved by the Company for their own diſpoſal. For though the ſums appropriated to the civil and military eſtabliſhments paſſed through the Nabob's hands, yet, as the Nabob was utterly dependent on the Company, they ſtill directed the expenditure. The annual revenue, which the Company would derive from its territorial poſſeſſions, after all expences ſhould be paid, was eſtimated by Lord Clive at one million ſeven hundred thouſand pounds per annum (b).

(b) Appendix to the Third Report of the Select Committee.

In this manner the ſettlement of all diſputes with the country powers, (the firſt object of Lord Clive's extraordinary commiſſion) was happily completed.

The ſecond object, the reformation of abuſes, was a much more arduous undertaking. Of theſe abuſes, the one which moſt required, and leaſt admitted of a remedy, was the cuſtom that prevailed among the Company's ſervants, both military and civil, of accepting, and, too often perhaps, of extorting, preſents from the natives of the country. If this cuſtom ſhould be permitted to continue, the endeavours of the Engliſh would conſtantly be exerted in effecting new revolutions. Every factor would become a trader in blood; and the Company itſelf, exhauſted by repeated conteſts, be eventually deſtroyed. But notwithſtanding the firmneſs of Lord Clive and his aſſociates in the Select Committee, corruption is too conſonant to the principles and views that generally prevail among thoſe who ſeek their fortunes in diſtant and unwholeſome climates, to be ever, by any efforts, completely ſubdued in India.

Two other extravagant abuſes engaged the attention of the committee. The firſt of theſe was the allowance of double ſubſiſtence-money, claimed by the officers on the Bengal eſtabliſhment, as their peculiar privilege. The reformation of this abuſe produced a mutiny in each of the three detachments into which the Bengal army was, at that time, divided; and roſe to ſuch a height, that almoſt all the officers (the field-officers excepted) threw up their commiſſions, with many threats againſt the perſon of Lord Clive. The danger to the Company's ſettlement was great and immediate: for, at that very time, ſixty thouſand hoſtile Morattoes had taken the field. Yet ſuch was the reſolution, ſuch the admirable addreſs of this great man, that the tumult was ſoon appeaſed.

For the better defence of the country, he formed the troops into three diviſions; each of which conſiſted of one regiment of Europeans, ſeven battalions of diſciplined natives, (every battalion containing ſeven hundred rank and file) and a company of artillery. One of theſe diviſions was ſtationed in barracks at Halehabad, on the confines of the Emperor's and Sujah-ul-Dowlah's dominion; another in barracks at Patna; and a third in barracks at, or near Calcutta (i).

(i) Ninth Report from the Secret Committee on India affairs, anno 1773.

Another dangerous abuſe, the principal ſource of the late war, ſtill remained; which was, the private trade of the Company's ſervants in the principal articles of inland conſumption. This private trade, which has often been called, from ſome of the chief commodities, the trade in ſalt, beetle-nut, and tobacco, was not only oppreſſive, but utterly ruinous to the natives. The Engliſh and their agents became the ſole dealers in theſe articles; by which a numerous claſs of the natives were deprived of the means of ſubſiſtence. But this was a partial evil: the miſchief was much more widely diffuſed. Power was become the meaſure of price; and it was ſaid, that the Engliſh, when they bought, gave what they pleaſed; and when they ſold, took what they pleaſed, till property was rendered ſo inſecure, that the miſerable native no longer knew what he could call his own. So flagrant a violation of the common maxims of equity and prudence, was neither unnoticed nor uncenſured by the Court of Directors in England: for they ſtrictly and repeatedly prohibited the inland trade, as contrary to juſtice, to the intereſts of the Company, and to the rights of the natives (k). But Lord Clive, and the other members of the Select Committee, ſeem to have conſidered the evil as ſo inveterate, that no expedient would operate as an effectual cure. Hence, as they poſſeſſed diſcretionary powers, they reſolved to regulate an abuſe, which they could not remove; and to render the trade in ſalt beneficial to the Company and its ſervants, without oppreſſing the natives (l). With this view, a ſociety was formed for carrying on the principal branches of the inland trade; and to this ſociety the Company's ſervants, both military and civil, were admitted; their different ſhares in the profits being proportioned to their reſpective ranks. Certain duties were alſo impoſed for the benefit of the Company itſelf; and various regulations reſpecting the price, were made for the benefit of the natives (m).

(k) Fourth Report from the Select Committee on India affairs, anno 1773.

Lord Clive's line was military, not commercial. Under his direction the trade of the ſociety might, perhaps, have been confined to ſalt, its original object, and have proved an uſeful inſtitution. Under that of his ſucceſſors, it extended to the other neceſſaries of life, and became a cruel monopoly, the forerunner of a hideous famine.

Such, indeed, was the power of the Engliſh, with reſpect to the natives; and ſo weak in India were the reſtraints of law, that remedies for old grievances became the inſtruments of new oppreſſions.

Lord Clive ſailed from Calcutta, on his return to England, in the beginning of the year 1767, and arrived there in the following July.

Whoever contemplates the forlorn ſituation of the Company, when Lord Clive firſt arrived at Calcutta, in the year 1756, and then conſiders the degree of opulence and power they poſſeſſed when he finally left that place, in the year 1767, will be convinced, that the hiſtory of the world has ſeldom afforded an inſtance of ſo rapid and improbable a change. At the firſt period, they were merely an aſſociation of Merchants ſtruggling for exiſtence. One of their factories was in ruins, their agents were murdered, and an army of fifty thouſand men, to which they had nothing to oppoſe, threatened the immediate deſtruction of their principal ſettlement. At the laſt period, diſtant from the firſt but ten years, they were become powerful Princes, poſſeſſed of vaſt revenues, and ruling over fifteen millions of people (n).

(n) Lord Clive's firſt Speech.

When the merits of thoſe, who contributed to this great revolution, ſhall be weighed in the impartial judgment of future times, it will be found, that Watſon, Pocock, Adams, and Monro, deſerved well of the Company; but that Clive was its ſaviour, and the principal author of its greatneſs.

After Lord Clive's laſt return from India, he was made, in 1769, one of the Knights Companions of the noble order of the Bath.

Though his exploits will excite the admiration, and receive the plaudits of poſterity, yet, in his life-time, the ſame ingratitude was ſhewn him, which the greateſt men, in all ages and countries, have experienced. For, on the pretence "that all acquiſitions "made under the influence of a military force, or by treaty with foreign powers, do, "of right, belong to the ſtate," a party in the Houſe of Commons, countenanced by the Miniſter, attempted to ruin both his fortune and his fame. A motion was made in this aſſembly, on the 21ſt of February, 1773, to reſolve, "that in the acquiſition of his "wealth, Lord Clive had abuſed the powers with which he was entruſted (o)" The ſpeech he made on the occaſion, concluded with the following words: "If the reſolution "propoſed ſhould receive the aſſent of the Houſe, I ſhall have nothing left that I can call "my own, except my paternal fortune of five hundred a year, and which has been in the "family for ages paſt. But upon this I am content to live; and perhaps I ſhall find more "real content of mind and happineſs, than in the trembling affluence of an unſettled for-"tune. But to be called, after ſixteen years have elapſed, to account for my conduct in "this manner; and after an uninterrupted enjoyment of my property, to be queſtioned, "and conſidered as obtaining it unwarrantably, is hard indeed! and a treatment of which "I ſhould not think the Britiſh Senate capable. Yet if this ſhould be the caſe, I have "a conſcious innocence within me, that tells me my conduct is irreproachable.—"Frangas, non flectes.—They may take from me what I have; they may, as they think, "make me poor, but I will be happy. Before I ſit down, I have one requeſt to make "to the Houſe, that when they come to decide upon my honour, they will not forget "their own (p)."

(o) Journals of the Houſe.

(p) Lord Clive's ſecond Speech, printed in Almon's Debates, anno 1773.

The Houſe of Commons rejected the motion, and reſolved, "That Lord Clive had "rendered great and meritorious ſervices to his country (q)."

(q) Journals of the Houſe.

Such was the iſſue of this diſgraceful perſecution. If, indeed, the Miniſter had made his attack upon thoſe men, whoſe names are recorded only in the regiſter of a people's ſufferings; upon thoſe men who, under the pretence of cuſtomary preſents, extorted from wretches, who had nothing but their ſubſiſtence to give, two thouſand a year for their footman, two thouſand a year for their toilet, two thouſand five hundred a year for the expences of their table (r); upon men who, under the pretence of keeping the banks of rivers in repair, harraſſed the people by exactions, that had neither rule nor limit (s); upon men who, under the pretence of a traffic in ſalt, ſeized the neceſſaries of life, and eſtabliſhed a trade, the currents of which were ſtained with blood; upon men, who aggravated the horrors even of peſtilence and famine; and when half the inhabitants were ſwept away, inſiſted that the living ſhould pay the taxes of the dead, he would then have acted as the guardian of his country's honour, and as the friend of human kind (t).

When the diſputes between Great-Britain and her Colonies had ariſen to ſuch a height, that they were not likely to be terminated any other way than by open hoſtilities, overtures were made to Lord Clive to accept of the chief command in America. But he declined the propoſal, on account of the ill ſtate of his health, and from a conſciouſneſs that the vigour of his mind was not equal to what it had heretofore been. He did not dare, in theſe circumſtances, to undertake an affair of ſuch importance, leſt, in the end, he ſhould be found unequal to the undertaking. The Americans, and the friends of American liberty, will probably think they have cauſe to rejoice, that his military abilities were not on this occaſion brought to a trial.

Lord

Lord Clive was one of the few men, whoſe conduct was always directed by the dictates of his own mind, and whoſe deciſions were therefore ſecret. Like the firſt of the Cæſars, the talents of other men could add nothing to the reach of his genius, or the correctneſs of his judgment. He was indeed (as Mr. Pitt emphatically called him) "a heaven-born General, who without experience, or being verſed in military affairs, "ſurpaſſed all the officers of his time."

In Parliament he repreſented, from the year 1760 to the time of his deceaſe, the antient borough of Shrewſbury, the principal town of the county in which he was born. The intereſt which he took in the diſputations of this Aſſembly, was ſeldom ſufficient to induce him to ſpeak: but when the attack upon his conduct had called into action the powers of his mind, his eloquence was ſuch as has not often been ſurpaſſed.

The ſevere illneſs with which Lord Clive was attacked, during his firſt reſidence in the Eaſt-Indies, gave an injury to his conſtitution which was never fully repaired; and his health was farther weakened by his ſucceſſive viſits to the unwholeſome climates of that country. Hence it was, that he became ſubject, at times, to a depreſſion of ſpirits. His ardent and active mind, when not called into exertion by ſome great occaſion, frequently preyed upon itſelf. In the latter part of his life, having nothing peculiarly important and intereſting to engage his attention, and his body growing more and more infirm, the depreſſion increaſed; and to this was owing his deceaſe, on the twenty-ſecond of November, 1774, not long after he had entered into the fiftieth year of his age. He was interred at Moreton-Say, the pariſh in which he was born.

In the various relations of private life, Lord Clive was highly beloved and eſteemed; for he was a man of the kindeſt affections, and of every ſocial virtue. His ſecret charities were numerous and extenſive; but the preſent he made of ſeventy thouſand pounds, as a proviſion for the invalids of the Company's ſervice, was the nobleſt donation of its kind, that ever came from a private individual.

His perſon was of the largeſt of the middle ſize; his countenance inclined to ſadneſs; and the heavineſs of his brow imparted an unpleaſing expreſſion to his features. It was a heavineſs that aroſe, not from the prevalence of the unſocial paſſions, (for of theſe few men had a ſmaller ſhare) but from a natural fulneſs in the fleſh above the eye-lid. His words were few; and his manner, among ſtrangers, was reſerved; yet it won the confidence of men, and gained admiſſion to the heart. Among his intimate friends he had great pleaſantry and jocoſeneſs, and on ſome occaſions was too open.

In February, 1753, immediately before he embarked for England, he married Margaret Maſkelyne, daughter of Edmund Maſkelyne, Eſq; of Purton, in Wiltſhire, and ſiſter to the Rev. Dr. Nevil Maſkelyne, the preſent Aſtronomer Royal. By this Lady, who is ſtill living, he had Edward, the preſent Lord Clive, born March 7, 1754; Rebecca, born September 15, 1760; Charlotte, born January 15, 1762; Margaret, born Auguſt 15, 1763; and Robert, born Auguſt 31, 1769.]

 [COCKBURN (CATHARINE), a Lady much diſtinguiſhed by her literary accompliſhments, and author of ſeveral ingenious works, was born in London, on the 16th of Auguſt, 1679 (a). She was the daughter of Captain David Trotter [A], who was a native of Scotland, and a commander in the royal navy, in the reign of King Charles the Second. Her mother was Mrs. Sarah Ballenden, who was nearly related

[A] She was the daughter of Captain David Trotter.] Dr. Birch informs us, that 'her father was highly in 'favour with King Charles II. and his brother the 'Duke of York; and his known probity and integrity gained him an univerſal eſteem, being generally diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of honeſt David; 'and James, Earl of Perth, Lord High-Chancellor 'of Scotland in the latter end of that King's reign, 'and the following one, in a very pathetic letter, 'which he wrote to his widow upon his death, ſtyles 'him an ornament to his country. He ſerved the crown 'from his youth, with great gallantry and fidelity, 'both by land and ſea; and during the Dutch war 'took, beſides other prizes, one which was ſold by 'the government for thirty thouſand pounds. He 'attended Lord Dartmouth, as Commodore, in the 'demolition of Tangier, in the latter end of the year '1683; and ſoon after was ſent by his Majeſty, with 'a view of making his fortune, to convoy the fleet 'of the Turkey Company; but being ſeized by the 'plague, then raging at Scandaroon, died there. 'His death was an irreparable loſs to his family, who 'were defrauded of all his effects on board his ſhip, 'which were very conſiderable, and of all the money, which he had advanced to the ſeamen, during 'a long voyage, by the diſhoneſty of the Purſer and 'others; the chief officers of the ſhip being likewiſe 'dead of the ſame diſtemper, which had proved ſo 'fatal to the Captain. And, to add to the misfortune of his widow, the Goldſmith, in whoſe hands 'the greateſt part of his money was lodged, became 'ſoon after a bankrupt. Theſe accumulated circumſtances of diſtreſs excited the compaſſion of 'King Charles II. which, concurring with his regard for the memory of an old and faithful ſervant, 'induced his Majeſty to give a favourable reference 'to the Admiralty for a penſion to the widow, which 'ended with that King's life; nor had ſhe any conſideration for her loſſes in the two ſucceeding reigns. 'But Queen Anne, upon her acceſſion to the throne, 'granted her an annual penſion of twenty pounds, 'which was conſtantly paid by the Ducheſs of Marlborough into the hands of Dr. Burnet, Biſhop of 'Saliſbury, till the removal of her Grace from 'Court; when, upon the widow's renewing her application, her Majeſty continued it as before.

'Capt. Trotter, at his death, left only two 'daughters, the elder of whom being afterwards 'married to Dr. Inglis, late Phyſician-general to the 'army, had by him two ſons, one of whom died 'Vicar of Lewiſham in Kent, and the other was 'Chaplain to Mr. Trelawney, Governor of Jamaica, 'in which iſland he had a conſiderable benefice, where 'he died a few years ago (1).'

to the noble Lord of that name, and to the illuſtrious families of Maitland, Duke of Lauderdale, and Drummond, Earl of Perth (b). She had the misfortune to loſe her father when very young; an event which alſo reduced her mother to narrow circumſtances. She gave early evidences of genius; and was yet in her childhood, when ſhe ſurprized a company of her relations and friends with ſome extemporary verſes, on an incident which had happened in the ſtreet, and which excited her attention. Her uncle, who was a commander in the navy, being preſent on the occaſion, was much ſtruck with this inſtance of the pregnancy of her wit; and took notice of the great ſatisfaction which it would have given to her father, if he had been then living, as he had a peculiar taſte and love for poetry (c). By her own application and diligence, without any inſtructor, ſhe learned to write, and alſo made herſelf miſtreſs of the French language. But ſhe had ſome aſſiſtance in the ſtudy of the Latin Grammar and Logic; and of the latter ſhe drew up an abſtract for her own uſe (d). She was educated in the Proteſtant religion, but having an early intimacy with ſeveral Roman Catholic families of diſtinction, ſhe was led, when very young, to form ſtrong prejudices in favour of Popery. She had ſome conferences on the ſubjects in diſpute between the Proteſtants and Papiſts, with ſeveral eminent and learned members of the Church of England; but they were not ſucceſsful in their attempts to convince her of the errors of Popery; ſo that ſhe embraced the Romiſh communion, and continued in it for ſome years (e).

In 1693, when ſhe was only fourteen years of age, ſhe wrote ſome verſes, and ſent them to Mr. Bevil Higgons, "on his ſickneſs and recovery from the ſmall-pox." In theſe lines, ſhe ſpeaks of that gentleman as having been diſtinguiſhed by uncommon perſonal beauty, before he was ſeized with that diſorder (f). She was only in her ſeventeenth year, when ſhe produced a tragedy, entitled, "Agnes de Caſtro," which was acted, with applauſe, at the Theatre-Royal, in 1695. It was printed the following year, in quarto, without her name, but with a dedication to the Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex [B]. The play is founded upon a French novel of the ſame title, printed at Paris in 1688, of which Mrs. Behn has given an Engliſh tranſlation (g).

In 1697, our authoreſs addreſſed ſome verſes to Mr. Congreve [C] on his "Mourning Bride;" which gave riſe to an acquaintance between her and that celebrated writer [D]. In 1698, her tragedy, intitled, "Fatal Friendſhip," was performed at the new Theatre in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and printed the ſame year in 4to. with a dedication to the Princeſs Anne of Denmark. This play is conſidered as the moſt perfect of her dramatic performances; it was acted with great applauſe, and poſſeſſes conſiderable merit; though, perhaps, ſome circumſtances in the plot are rather unnatural. Several complimentary copies of verſes were ſent to her upon her producing this tragedy, and which were prefixed to it when it was printed. One of theſe, which was ſent to her anonymouſly, was written by Mr. John Hughes, author of the Siege of Damaſcus. Mr. George Farquhar was likewiſe ſo much pleaſed with her tragedy, that he ſoon after took the opportunity of ſending to her his firſt comedy, called "Love and a Bottle,"

[B] With a dedication to the Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex.] In this dedication, ſhe obſerved, that "this little offſpring of her early Muſe had been firſt "ſubmitted to his Lordſhip's judgment, whether it "ſhould be ſtifled in the birth, or preſerved to try "its fortune in the world (2)."

'Sublime thy thoughts, eaſy thy numbers flow,
'Yet, to comport with them, majeſtic too.
'But to expreſs how thou our ſouls doſt move,
'How, at thy will, we rage, we grieve, we love,
'Requires a lofty, almoſt equal flight,
'Nor dare I aim at ſuch a dang'rous height,
'A taſk which well might Dryden's Muſe engage,
'Worthy the firſt, beſt Poet of the age;
'Whoſe long retreat, that we might leſs bemoan,
'He left us thee, his greateſt darling ſon,
'Poſſeſſor of the ſtage, once his alone (3).'

[D] Gave riſe to an acquaintance between her and that celebrated writer.] On the receipt of her verſes, Mr. Congreve ſent her the following letter:

'I can never enough acknowledge the honour you 'have done me, nor enough regret the negligence 'of thoſe to whom you delivered your valuable let-'ter. It is the firſt thing that ever happened to me, 'upon which I ſhould make it my choice to be vain. 'And yet ſuch is the mortification, that attends even 'the moſt allowable vanity, that at the ſame inſtant 'I am robbed of the means, when I am poſſeſſed of 'the inclination. It is but this moment that I re-'ceived your verſes; and had ſcarce been tranſported 'with the reading them, when they brought me the 'play from the preſs, printed off. I hope you will 'do me the juſtice to believe, that I was not ſo in-'ſenſible, as not to be heartily vexed; and all the 'ſatisfaction that I can take, and all the ſacrifice 'that I make to you, is only to ſtifle ſome verſes on 'the ſame barren ſubject, which were printed with 'it, and now, I aſſure you, ſhall never appear, what-'ever apology I am forced to make to the authors. 'And ſince I am deprived of the recommendation 'you deſigned me, I will be obliged to no other, till 'I have ſome future opportunity of preferring your's 'to every body's elſe. In the mean time, give me 'leave to value myſelf upon the favour you have 'done me; and to aſſure you, it was not wanting to 'make me more ready, than I have been, in my in-'clinations of waiting on all your commands: and 'if Mr. Betterton's buſineſs does not very ſpeedily 'diſengage him, I will not wait for his being a wit-'neſs of my profeſſing myſelf accompanied with a complimentary letter [E]. On the death of Mr. Dryden, in 1701, our Poeteſs joined with ſeveral other ladies, in paying a juſt tribute to his memory in verſe. Their performances were publiſhed together, in that year, under the title of, "The nine Muſes; or, Poems written by ſo many Ladies, upon the Death of the late famous John Dryden, Eſq; (b)." The ſame year ſhe alſo brought upon the ſtage a comedy, called, "Love at a loſs; or, moſt Votes carry it." It was acted at the Theatre-Royal, and publiſhed in quarto, with a dedication to Lady Piers, wife of Sir George Piers, an officer of conſiderable rank under the Duke of Marlborough. That lady, who had a literary taſte, and was particularly fond of poetry, had contracted a great eſteem and friendſhip for our authoreſs. But this comedy, on account of her abſence from London while it was in the preſs, was ſo incorrectly printed, that ſhe would gladly have ſuppreſſed the edition, if it had been eaſily practicable; and many years after ſhe reviſed the piece, and made great alterations in it, having ſome thoughts of bringing it again on the ſtage, under the title of "The honourable Deceivers; or, All right at the laſt (i)." But this deſign was never effected. Soon after, before the cloſe of the year 1701, ſhe produced another tragedy, called "The Unhappy Penitent," which was performed at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-lane. It was printed in 4to, with a dedication to Charles, Lord Halifax, in which ſhe expreſſes her doubts, whether love was a proper ſubject for tragedy; as it appeared to her not to be a paſſion ſufficiently noble or ſublime for that ſpecies of writing (k). To this tragedy ſome complimentary verſes were prefixed, written by her friend Lady Piers (l).

But her attention was far from being wholly engroſſed by poetry and dramatic writing. On the contrary, ſhe ſometimes applied herſelf cloſely to ſubjects of a very different nature; and, in particular, ſpent much of her time in metaphyſical ſtudies. She was a great admirer of Mr. Locke's Eſſay on human Underſtanding; and, therefore, drew up a defence of that work, againſt ſome remarks which were publiſhed againſt it, without a name, but which were afterwards known to be written by Dr. Thomas Burnet, Maſter of the Charter-Houſe (m). Mrs. Trotter's defence of Mr. Locke's Eſſay was finiſhed at the beginning of the month of December, 1701, when ſhe was only twenty-two years of age (n). It was publiſhed in the May following; but ſhe concealed the name of the author, partly from an apprehenſion, that the public would be prejudiced againſt a metaphyſical treatiſe written by a woman. She alſo profeſſed herſelf to be deſirous of concealing her name, from an unwillingneſs to be known to Mr. Locke, under the character of his defender. In an anonymous addreſs to that great man, prefixed to her piece, ſhe ſtyles her performance "a bold unlicenſed undertaking;" ſhe declares, that though ſhe had ventured to publiſh her defence of Mr. Locke, it was "not without much apprehenſion and awe of his diſpleaſure;" and in a letter to George Burnet, Eſq; of Kemnay, a gentleman who had much friendſhip for her, and with whom ſhe often correſponded, ſhe ſays, "I am more afraid of appearing before him I defend, than of the public cenſure; and chiefly, for the honour I bear to him, reſolve to conceal myſelf (o)." But her name as the writer of this piece was not long concealed; and Mr. Locke deſired his couſin, Mr. King, afterwards Lord-Chancellor, to pay her a viſit, and make her a preſent of books; and upon her owning her performance, he wrote her a letter of acknowledgment [F]. She alſo received a letter of thanks for this [E] Accompanied with a complimentary letter.] Mr. Farquhar's firſt comedy was performed in the ſame year in which our authoreſs's tragedy of Fatal Friendſhip appeared; and in his letter to her, after complaining, that his play "had been ſcandalouſly aſperſed for affronting the ladies," he obſerved, that "as an argument of its innocence, he ſent it to ſtand "its trial before one of the faireſt of the ſex, and "the beſt judge. Beſides, madam," added he, "it "is an offering due to the favour and honour ſhewed "me, in your appearance on my third night; and "a ſtranger cannot be denied the privilege of ſhewing his gratitude. But humbly to confeſs the "greateſt motive, my paſſions were wrought ſo high "by the repreſentation of Fatal Friendſhip, and "ſince raiſed ſo high by a ſight of the beautiful author, that I gladly catched this opportunity of "owning myſelf your moſt humble ſervant (5)."

(5) Birch, p. 8, 9.

[F] He wrote her a letter of acknowledgment.] Mr. Locke's letter was as follows:

'Oates, 30 Dec. 1702.

'Madam,

'There was nothing more public, than the obligation I received from you, nor any thing more concealed, than the perſon I was obliged to. This is a generoſity above the ſtrain of this groveling age, and like that of ſuperior ſpirits, who aſſiſt without ſhewing themſelves. I uſed my beſt endeavours to draw from you, by your Bookſeller, the confeſſion of your name, the want whereof made me, that I could, while you kept yourſelf under that reſerve, no more addreſs myſelf to you with good manners, than I could without rudeneſs have pulled off your maſk by force, in a place where you were reſolved to conceal yourſelf. Had not this been ſo, the bearer hereof had not the firſt time have come to you, without a letter from me, to acknowledge the favour you had done me. You not affording me an opportunity for that, I deſigned to make you ſome ſmall acknowledgment, in a way, that chance had opened to me, without your conſent. But this gentleman tranſgreſſed my order in two main points of it. The one was, in delaying it ſo long: the other was, in naming me to you, and talking of matters, which he had no commiſſion from me to mention. What he deſerves from you for it, muſt be left to your mercy. For I cannot in earneſt be angry with him for procuring me, without any guilt of mine, an opportunity to own you for my protectreſs, which is the greateſt honour my eſſay could have procured me. Give me leave, therefore, to aſſure you, that as the reſt of the world take notice of the ſtrength and clearneſs of your reaſoning, ſo I cannot but be extremely ſenſible, that it was employed in my defence. You have herein not only this piece from Mrs. Burnet [G], the laſt wife of the celebrated Prelate of that name.

It appears, that at the latter end of the year 1701, ſhe was ſome time at Saliſbury, on a viſit to her relations in that city. In a letter to her friend, Mr. George Burnet, dated from Saliſbury, the 9th of December, in that year, are the following paſſages: 'The 'Biſhop goes next week, whom I ſaw laſt night, being at his palace, to wait on his 'Lady. I am much obliged to them both, and have not a little reaſon to be vain, 'upon the advantageous things they have ſaid of my laſt plays; eſpecially the comedy. 'At leaſt, I may prefer the judgment of two ſuch perſons, to the raſh cenſures of a 'giddy multitude. My Lord's character is univerſally known; but give me leave to 'tell you, upon my particular obſervation of his Lady, what every body, that knows 'her, does allow; that ſhe has an extraordinary clear and ſolid judgment, the trueſt 'goodneſs and prudence, and the moſt charming affability in her behaviour: in ſhort, 'I have not met with ſuch perfection in any of our ſex.'—'You deſired news from me, 'but this place affords none; and I keep no correſpondence with intelligencers. I can 'only tell you of an unexpected pleaſure I had here. Abel came this way to the Bath, 'and complimented the Biſhop with a concert, where I was charmed with him enough 'to ride ſix miles after him to my Lord Arundel's for the ſame pleaſure, which has 'only increaſed my deſire of hearing him (p).'

(p) Ibid. p. 156.

Mrs. Trotter ſtill continued in the communion of the Church of Rome; and the ſincerity of her attachment to it, in all its outward ſeverities, obliged her to ſo ſtrict an obſervance of its faſts, as proved extremely injurious to her health. This occaſioned Dr. Denton Nicholas, an ingenious and learned Phyſician of her acquaintance [H], to adviſe her by a letter, dated October 19, 1703, to abate of thoſe rigours of abſtinence to which ſhe addicted herſelf; which he repreſented as inſupportable to a conſtitution naturally infirm: and he deſired her to ſhew his letter to her friends and confeſſor for their ſatisfaction (q). This was probably the ſame Phyſician, who is mentioned in one of her letters to Mr. Burnet; and by whom ſhe ſpeaks of herſelf as having been inſtructed in geography, and kindly furniſhed with globes, maps, and books (r).

(q) Life, p. 21.

(r) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 166.

But though ſhe continued to be a member of the Romiſh Church, ſhe expreſſed herſelf with great candour reſpecting thoſe of different ſentiments; and, indeed, with a moderation, hardly conſiſtent with the character of a ſound Catholic. In a letter to Mr. Burnet, ſhe ſays, 'I am ſorry, Sir, the difference there is between us, in the con-'troverted points of religion, ſhould abate any thing of the little happineſs you could 'vanquiſhed my adverſary, but reduced me alſo ab-'ſolutely under your power, and left no deſires more 'ſtrong in me, than thoſe of meeting with ſome op-'portunity, to aſſure you, with what reſpect and 'ſubmiſſion, I am,

'Madam, your moſt humble,
'and moſt obedient ſervant,
'J. Locke (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 19, 20.

In her defence of Mr. Locke, Mrs. Trotter proved, that there was nothing in his ſentiments which weakened the evidences of a future ſtate, or which was inconſiſtent with the principles of morality, or with any of the doctrines of Chriſtianity: and ſhe maintained, that it was of dangerous conſequence to aſſert, that the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul depended on its immateriality.

[G] A letter of thanks for this piece from Mrs. Burnet.] That lady's letter, which we ſhall alſo lay before our readers, was as follows:

'Madam,

'If I have not more haſtily returned my thanks for 'the valuable preſent you ſent me, it has been, in 'part, out of a deſire to ſend you better judgments 'than my own, for its approbation and praiſe. The 'Biſhop, Mr. Norris, and ſome others, no ill judges 'of ſuch a performance, have, with great readineſs, 'profeſſed themſelves extremely pleaſed: and it is 'not without difficulty ſome can believe, that any 'one, not bred to ſcience, and logic in particular, 'could be capable of ſo cloſe and clear reaſoning. I 'am no fit judge of this, nor of the certainty of all 'the proofs, which are things ſo nice, as to make me 'ſuſpect my capacity to determine about them; ſo 'can only ſay, I am ſatisfied and pleaſed. But that 'can be no confirmation, were you doubtful; but 'what I cannot but obſerve and commend, is, that 'the whole is written ſhort and clear, without affec-'tation of wit or eloquence, needleſs reflections on 'your adverſary, or making him more in the wrong 'than he is; rather bringing him nearer, than 'driving him farther from truth; taking his words 'in as good a ſenſe, as they would bear, in which I 'heartily wiſh the ſearchers after truth would imitate 'you. If they did, I am perſuaded, there would be 'both more light, as well as more charity in the 'world, than at preſent, while ſuch deſtructive me-'thods to both are taken, can be expected. I confeſs, 'I cannot but repeat what I ever think, and have 'generally found, ſo ſure a mark of a good judg-'ment, modeſty, and freedom from affectation, 'which is alone a beauty, but when accompanied 'with other excellencies, makes them much more 'valuable, and the want of them makes wit and 'knowledge itſelf diſagreeable. I heartily wiſh you 'may improve to the beſt uſes ſuch excellent talents, 'that nothing may obſcure their luſtre, but that you 'may be delivered from every error. I ſhould be 'glad to be in any ways ſerviceable to theſe good 'ends, or in any other reſpect expreſs my readineſs 'to be

'Your faithful humble ſervant,

(7) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

[H] Dr. Denton Nicholas, an ingenious and learned Phyſician of her acquaintance.] Dr. Birch informs us, that to this gentleman ſhe wrote, in the beginning of the year 1704, 'a letter upon the truth of the Chriſ-'tian religion, which, it is to be regretted, is not 'recoverable, ſince in his anſwer he obſerves, that 'ſhe had proved unanſwerably what ſhe had under-'taken, and had done it more clearly and effectually in 'half a ſheet, than Grotius in a whole volume; though 'he differed with her in one point, where, from her 'prejudices in favour of Popery, ſhe leſſened the au-'thority of the ſcriptures, which, he remarked, 'would neceſſarily make way for oral tradition, and 'too great an authority in the Church (8).'

6 'find

'find in my company. For my part, I conſider nothing in the opinions of my friends, 'but what is likely to influence their morals; and provided they worſhip the true God, 'and acknowledge the doctrine and authority of Jeſus Chriſt, I think we are ſuffici-'ently united in religion for all the ends of friendſhip. To ſay the truth, I have of 'late almoſt forgot all diſtinction of churches; for having had ſome occaſion of ob-'ſerving, more than before, the great growth of infidelity; that there are many, who 'diſbelieve, and more, who doubt, that there ever was any divine revelation, I have 'employed myſelf much in conſidering the proofs, and defending the truth of the 'Chriſtian religion; which has ſo entirely engaged my concern, that when I am with 'thoſe, who ſincerely ſubmit to the authority of Jeſus Chriſt, what ſenſe ſoever they 'underſtand him in, I am ſatisfied, and really think myſelf with one of my own com-'munion (s).'

Her friend Mr. Burnet, continued to keep up a correſpondence with her during his travels; and upon his arrival at the court of Berlin, where he was received with great marks of reſpect by Sophia Charlotte, Queen of Pruſſia, daughter to the Princeſs Sophia, he took an opportunity of writing to that Princeſs in ſuch advantageous terms of Mrs. Trotter, that her Royal Highneſs, in her anſwer to him from Hanover, on the 29th of July, 1704, declared herſelf "charmed with the agreeable picture, which he "had drawn of the new Scots Sappho, who ſeemed to deſerve all the great things "which he had ſaid of her." Je ſuis charmée du portrait avantageux, que vous me faites de la nouvelle Sappho Ecoſſoiſe, qui ſemble meriter les eloges, que vous luy donnez (t). In 1704, Mrs. Trotter addreſſed ſome verſes to the Duke of Marlborough, upon his return from Germany, after the battle of Blenheim. They were honoured with the approbation of the Duke and Ducheſs, and of the Lord-Treaſurer Godolphin. In 1706, after the battle of Ramillies, ſhe alſo addreſſed a ſecond poem to the Duke of Marlborough, upon that important event (u). The ſame year, her tragedy, called "The "Revolution of Sweden," was acted at the Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket, and printed at London in quarto, with a dedication to the Lady Harriet Godolphin, eldeſt daughter to the Duke of Marlborough [I]. About three years before this tragedy was brought upon the ſtage, ſhe had communicated the firſt draught of it to Mr. Congreve, who returned her an anſwer, containing ſome remarks upon the conduct of the drama, which have been publiſhed by Dr. Birch (w). The play is founded upon the revolution in Sweden under Guſtavus Erickſon. She had now for ſome time begun to entertain doubts concerning the Romiſh religion; which led her into a thorough examination of the grounds of it, by conſulting the beſt books on both ſides of the queſtion, and converſing with perſons of the beſt judgment, both Papiſts and Proteſtants, amongſt her acquaintance. The reſult of her enquiries was, a full conviction of the falſeneſs of the pretenſions of the Romiſh Church, and a return to the communion of the Church of England. This important change in her ſentiments took place about the beginning of the year 1707; and ſhe continued a firm Proteſtant during the remainder of her life. In the courſe of her enquiries, the great queſtion concerning "a Guide in Con-"troverſies," was particularly diſcuſſed by her; and two letters which ſhe wrote on this ſubject, were publiſhed this year under the following title: "A Diſcourſe concerning "a Guide in Controverſies, in two Letters [K]: Written to one of the Church of "Rome, by a Perſon lately converted from that Communion."

A conſiderable part of the ſummer of the year 1707, was ſpent by Mrs. Trotter at Ockham-Mills, near Ripley, in the county of Surrey. During her retirement there, Mr. Fenn, a young Clergyman of an excellent character, who was accidentally in the neighbourhood on a viſit to his relations, received ſuch impreſſions from her company and converſation, as inſpired him with a paſſion for her, which he ſoon after diſcovered to her by a letter. But ſhe had previouſly engaged in a friendſhip, and correſpondence

[I] With a dedication to the Lady Harriet Godolphin, &c.] In this dedication ſhe obſerves, that poetry is not unworthy the protection of the wiſe and good, but has been cheriſhed as an inſtrument of virtue, in the politeſt and beſt-governed commonwealths, and as ſuch called a divine art; "a character," continues ſhe, "it might ſtill pretend to, if reſcued from "the trifling, or ill ends, to which it has been de-"baſed. At leaſt, it muſt be owned very advanta-"geous in a nation, where public diverſions are al-"lowed and frequented, to contrive, that our plea-"ſures ſhould be uſeful to our morals, ſerve to cor-"rect our vices, and animate the mind to virtue: a "deſign, which is the only merit that can recom-"mend this play; and the particular virtue it tends "to incite, a diſintereſted and reſolute care of the "public good (9)."

(9) Ibid. p. 29.

[K] A Diſcourſe concerning a Guide in Controverſies, in two Letters.] A ſhort preface was prefixed to theſe letters, written by Biſhop Burnet; in which he ſpoke of them as commendable for "the ſtrength and clear-"neſs of the reaſoning;" and obſerves, that they were written "with that judgment, and withal with "that plainneſs, that they may be at all times uſe-"ful to thoſe of our own communion, that want to "be fortified againſt the bold pretences to infallibi-"lity in the Church of Rome."

Dr. Birch has preſerved a letter, written by Mrs. Burnet to Mrs. Trotter; whence it appears, that the former, by the deſire of the latter, had communicated a paper, containing ſome of the Popiſh arguments in favour of the neceſſity of a guide in controverſies, to Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Samuel Clarke, requeſting his ſentiments; and Mrs. Burnet's letter contains an account of what he ſaid to her on the ſubject in converſation (10).

by letters, with Mr. Cockburn; and their friendſhip terminated in a marriage [L], in the beginning of the year 1708 (x). Mr. Cockburn had taken orders in the Church of England but a ſhort time before his marriage; and ſoon after that event, he had the donative of Nayland in Suffolk. He immediately repaired thither, bur Mrs. Cockburn continued for ſome time in London [M]. They were afterwards ſettled at Nayland; but did not long continue at that place, Mr. Cockburn removing thence to the metropolis, to be Curate of St. Dunſtan's Church in Fleet-ſtreet (y). In this ſituation he remained till the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, when entertaining ſome doubts about taking the oath of abjuration, though he always prayed for the King and royal family by name, he was obliged to quit his curacy; and for the ten or twelve following years, he was reduced to great difficulties in procuring ſubſiſtence for his family. During that period, he was employed in inſtructing the youth of an Academy in Chancery-lane in the Latin tongue (z). But in the year 1726, by conſulting the Lord-Chancellor King, and his own father, upon the meaning and intent of the oath of abjuration, and by reading ſome papers which were put into his hands upon the ſubject, he was at length reconciled to taking it. In conſequence of this, being the following year invited to be Miniſter of the Epiſcopal Congregation at Aberdeen in Scotland, he qualified himſelf conformably to the law; and on the day of King George the Second's acceſſion, he preached there a ſermon on the duty and benefit of praying for the government. This ſermon was printed, and being animadverted upon, he publiſhed a reply to the remarks on it, with ſome papers relative to the oath of abjuration, which were much commended. Soon after his ſettlement at Aberdeen, the Lord-Chancellor King preſented him to the living of Long-Horſeley, near Morpeth, in Northumberland, in order to enable him the better to ſupport and educate his family. With this view, he was permitted to continue to diſcharge the duties of his function at Aberdeen, till the negligence and ill-behaviour of the Curates, whom he employed at Long-Horſeley, occaſioned Dr. Chandler, Biſhop of Durham, to call him to reſidence on that living in 1737; which obliged him to quit his ſtation at Aberdeen, whereby his income was conſiderably leſſened (a).

Mrs. Cockburn, after her marriage, was almoſt entirely prevented from any application to her ſtudies, for many years, in conſequence of her cloſe attention to the duties of a wife, and of a mother. To the ordinary cares of an increaſing family, were added thoſe reſulting from the ſtraitened circumſtances of her huſband; ſo that ſhe had little time for reading [N], being almoſt wholly occupied in her domeſtic duties. But in

[L] Their friendſhip terminated in a marriage.] Dr. Birch informs us, that ſeveral advantageous offers of that kind had been made to Mrs. Trotter before; but he adds, that 'being exempt from ambition, and 'finding too general a libertiniſm among the men, 'ſhe thought the beſt ſecurity of her happineſs in the 'conjugal ſtate would be the choice of a Clergyman. 'And as piety was the ground of their mutual af-'fection, ſo their chief view in their union was the 'improvement of themſelves in that great principle 'of all religious and moral excellence, and the aſ-'ſiſtance of each other in the duties flowing from 'it (11).'

(11) Ibid. p. 33.

The father of Mrs. Cockburn's huſband 'was Dr. 'Cockburn, an eminent and learned Divine of Scot-'land, at firſt attached to the court of St. Germain's, 'but obliged to quit it, on account of his inflexible 'adherence to the Proteſtant religion; then for ſome 'time Miniſter of the Epiſcopal Church at Amſter-'dam, and at laſt collated to the rectory of Northaw 'in Middleſex, by Dr. Robinſon, Biſhop of London, 'at the recommendation of Queen Anne, who in-'tended him for one of the Biſhops of our American 'Plantations, if the ſcheme of eſtabliſhing them had 'been executed (12).'

(12) Id. ibid.

Dr. Birch alſo obſerves, that Mr. Cockburn, the huſband of the ſubject of this article, 'was a man of 'conſiderable learning,' and 'publiſhed, in the 'Weekly Miſcellany, a defence of Prime Miniſters, in 'the character of Joſeph;' and likewiſe wrote 'a 'Treatiſe on the Moſaic Deluge, publiſhed ſince his 'death (13).'

[M] Mrs. Cockburn continued for ſome time in London.] In a letter to Mr. Burnet, dated from London, Sept. 10, 1708, Mrs. Cockburn informs him, that her huſband went to Nayland in the preceding June; and ſhe adds, 'Our affairs have not ſuffered me to go 'to him yet; ſo that we have been ſeparate near 'three months, except one week, that he was ſo kind 'to come and ſtay with me, when I was ill. I am 'now pretty well recovered, and am haſtening to him 'as much as I can; but I have a great deal of trou-'bleſome buſineſs to buſtle through, before I can 'compaſs it; for we have a houſe in the country to 'furniſh, and I muſt buy moſt things here in order 'to it, which is a new work to me, and a very ex-'penſive one. However, I hope to be at Nayland 'in leſs than a fortnight (14).'

[N] She had little time for reading.] In a letter of Mrs. Cockburn to her niece, dated Oct. 6, 1732, is the following paſſage: "Sundays being privileged "from the needle, I have found time of late to read "three ſhort pamphlets in anſwer to Chriſtianity as "old as the Creation, by Dr. Burnet, which, they "ſay, are the beſt that have been written on a ſub-"ject, that has for ſome time employed all pens and "heads (15)." In another letter, dated in the year 1740, ſhe intimates, that ſhe then read and wrote more in the long winter evenings, than ſhe did in the ſummer. The reaſon ſhe aſſigned for this was, that ſhe could not work by candle-light. "But in the "ſummer," ſays ſhe, "I am ſo much employed at "my needle, that I read little, and write leſs (16)."

In a letter that ſhe wrote, with a deſign of ſending it to Mr. Pope, is the following paſſage: 'You had 'but juſt begun to dawn upon the world, when I 'retired from it. Being married in 1708, I bid 'adieu to the Muſes, and ſo wholly gave myſelf up 'to the cares of a family, and the education of my 'children, that I ſcarcely knew, whether there was 'any ſuch thing as books, plays, or poems ſtirring 'in Great-Britain. However, after ſome years, 'your Eſſay on Criticiſm, and Rape of the Lock, 'broke in upon me. I rejoiced, that ſo bright a ge-'nius was riſing on our iſle; but thought no more 'about you, till my young family was grown up to 'have leſs need of my aſſiſtance; and beginning to 'have ſome taſte of polite literature, my inclination 'revived with my leiſure, to enquire after what had 'been moſt celebrated in that kind. I then read 'your Homer (17).'

1726, when she had been married about eighteen years, she published, "A Letter to "Dr. Holdsworth," in vindication of Mr. Locke [O]. Dr. Holdsworth, who was a Fellow of St. John's College in Oxford, had preached a sermon before the University, on John v. 28, 29. concerning the resurrection of the same body. This sermon he afterwards printed, in 8vo. professing, in his title page, to examine and answer "the ca-"vils, false reasonings, and false interpretations of scripture, of Mr. Locke, and "others, against the resurrection of the same body." Mrs. Cockburn remonstrated, in her publication, against the very unfair and uncandid manner in which Dr. Holdsworth had treated Mr. Locke: she shewed the inconclusiveness and inconsistency of his reasonings against him; and she very properly urged, that it could be of no service to the Church, nor was it in any respect prudent, to take so much pains to rank Mr. Locke amongst Heretics, and the worst enemies of Christianity. Dr. Holdsworth, however, still persisted to attack Mr. Locke, with the same zeal, the same bigotry, and the same want of justice and of candour, in his "Defence of the Doctrine of the Resurrection "of the same Body," which was published in one volume, 8vo. in the year 1727. To this Mrs. Cockburn wrote a reply, which she intitled, "A Vindication of Mr. "Locke's Christian Principles, from the injurious Imputations of Dr. Holdsworth." But though this is a performance of considerable merit, and she was extremely desirous of defending what she had before written, as well as of doing justice to Mr. Locke; yet as she could meet with no Bookseller who would undertake to print it at his own hazard, and as she could not herself afford to defray the expences of the publication, it continued in manuscript: but was afterwards printed in the edition of her works, published by Dr. Birch (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 36, 37.

In 1732, she wrote a poem on occasion of "the busts set up in the Queen's Hermi-"tage [P]." This piece was intended to have been presented, with her "Defence of

[O] A Letter to Dr. Holdsworth, &c.] Mrs. Cockburn observes in this piece, that Mr. Locke 'very 'frequently and earnestly expresses his belief of the 'last judgment, the resurrection of the dead, and 'that the dead shall rise again with their bodies. 'This,' says she, 'is surely all that is important to 'the great ends of religion, in the article of the re-'surrection; and this certainly should secure a man 'from being taxed of infidelity, or heresy, with re-'spect to that article, whatever he may think of the 'resurrection of the same body (18).'

(18) Works of Mrs. Cockburn, vol. i. p. 126.

In his controversy with the Bishop of Worcester, Mr. Locke says, 'In the New Testament, (wherein, 'I think, are contained all the articles of the Chris-'tian faith) I find our Saviour and the Apostles to 'preach the resurrection of the dead in many places. 'But I do not remember any place, where the resur-'rection of the same body is so much as mentioned. 'Nay, which is very remarkable in the case, I do not 'remember in any place (where the general resur-'rection at the last day is spoken of) any such ex-'pression, as the resurrection of the body, much less 'of the same body.' And Mrs. Cockburn observes, that the resurrection of the same body is 'a doctrine so 'doubtful in its meaning, so variously understood, of 'which the scriptures have determined nothing clear-'ly, and which is of so little importance to be deter-'mined, that all that is of consequence to the great 'ends of religion, in the article of the resurrection, 'is sufficiently secured without it. And I must own,' she adds, 'I do not see what service it can be of to 'the Christian Religion, to equal a question of curi-'osity with the most necessary articles of our faith; 'or to arraign an eminent and worthy man, one, 'who on all occasions seems to have his heart filled 'with sacred awe and sincere veneration for the holy 'scriptures, as an heretic and an infidel, for doubt-'ing about so useless and undetermined a question. 'That every man shall be raised again at the last 'day, in his own proper body, to be punished or re-'warded according to what he had done in this life; 'and that those, who have pleased God, shall with 'their own eyes, and not another's, see God, are truths, 'in which Mr. Locke, and Dr. Holdsworth agree: 'and what particles of matter their bodies shall be 'made up of, would not have been worth the least 'dispute, if it had no way been imposed as an article 'of faith (19).'

[P] A Poem on occasion of the Busts set up in the Queen's Hermitage.] This poem begins with the following lines:

'Of Albion's splendid court unmov'd I hear;
'Grandeur and pomp at distance can revere,
'Content, nor wish the dazzling scene were near.
'In glories more refin'd my thoughts delight,
'Chief the fam'd hermitage would charm my sight.
'Delicious Richmond! were thy prospect mine,
'With rapture I should view great Caroline,
'Where, in her native lustre, most she'll shine:
'There her superior soul itself displays,
'That Locke and Newton could design to raise.
'Rich in themselves she knew the solid ore,
'And gave the royal stamp to dignify it more.
'Yet each new honour, added to their name,
'Shall back reflect on her's a brighter fame,
'Great Caroline shall gloriously resound,
'While Clarke, and Locke, and Newton are renown'd.
'But not for such illustrious names alone,
'Has that choice seat her care of merit shewn:
'Shar'd by the most obscure, who greatly aim,
'Struggling thro' all impediments to fame.'

She then applauds the Queen for her patronage of Stephen Duck, and intimates a hope, that her Majesty's liberality may also be extended to her own sex, of some of whose hardships she complains.

'Learning deny'd us, we at random tread
'Unbeaten paths, that late to knowledge lead;
'By secret steps break thro' th' obstructed way,
'Nor dare acquirements gain'd by stealth display.
'If some advent'rous genius dare arise,
'Who on exalted themes her talent tries,
'She fears to give the work, tho' prais'd, a name,
'And flies not more from infamy than fame.
'Would royal Caroline our wrongs redress,
'Vouchsafe acceptance of this mean address;
'Favour a muse, who, tho' she weakly soars,
'With glory wing'd, thy patronage implores;
'Yet trembles, whilst she tenders at thy feet
'Her bold essay great Locke to vindicate.
'What worthy thee, or him, can gain the light,
'Whilst black'ning clouds depress, and damp our flight?
'If not the work, give the attempt applause,
'And patronize in her the sex's cause.'

When Mrs. Cockburn wrote this poem, she resided at Aberdeen: she wished to have been enabled to live in England, and speaks with regret of her being confined to Scotland.

'But I, alas! in northern climes grown old,
'No more my native country shall behold;
'Since providence has cast my latest lot,
'Her pleasing streams and shades be now forgot (20).'

" Mr. Locke's Eſſay," to Queen Caroline; but the Lord-Chancellor King declining that office, and the Ducheſs of Hamilton, who then undertook it, being prevented by ſickneſs, and the death of Lady Orkney, her ſiſter-in-law, it ſeems never to have come to the ſight of the Queen (c). It was afterwards printed in the Gentleman's Magazine, for May, 1737, though with ſome alterations, which ſhe thought to its diſadvantage (d). About two years after, ſhe wrote " Remarks upon ſome Writers in the Controverſy " concerning the Foundation of Moral Duty and Moral Obligation [Q]; particularly " the Tranſlator of Archbiſhop King's Origin of Moral Evil, and the Author of the " Divine Legation of Moſes: To which are prefixed, ſome curſory Thoughts on the " Controverſies concerning neceſſary Exiſtence, the Reality and Infinity of Space, the " Extenſion and Place of Spirits, and on Dr. Watts's Notion of Subſtance." Theſe remarks continued in manuſcript till the year 1743, no Bookſeller being inclined to undertake the publication of them; but they were introduced to the world in Auguſt, that year, in " the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (e)." She had the misfortune this year to loſe a daughter [R]; and it appears alſo, that ſhe had at this time a ſon in Germany, in ſome office connected with the army (f); and who was afterwards Clerk of the Cheque at Chatham.

When Dr. Rutherforth's " Eſſay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue" appeared, it ſoon engaged the attention of Mrs. Cockburn; ſo that, notwithſtanding an aſthmatic diſorder, which had ſeized her many years before, and now left her ſmall intervals of eaſe [S], ſhe undertook to write a confutation of that elaborate diſcourſe; and having executed it with great ſpirit, perſpicuity, and judgment, ſhe tranſmitted her manuſcript to Mr. Warburton, afterwards the celebrated Biſhop of Glouceſter. By that gentleman her performance was ſo much approved [T], that he himſelf undertook to get it publiſhed, and wrote a preface to it. It was publiſhed in 1747, under the title of " Remarks upon the Principles and Reaſonings of Dr. Rutherforth's Eſſay on the " Nature and Obligations of Virtue, in Vindication of the contrary Principles and [Q] Remarks upon ſome writers in the controverſy concerning the foundation of moral duty and moral obligation.] Mrs. Cockburn's name was not prefixed or ſubjoined to theſe remarks; but they were " inſcrib- " ed, with the utmoſt deference, to Alexander Pope, " Eſq; by an admirer of his moral character." She had conceived an high veneration for Mr. Pope, and was deſirous of being made known to him. With this view ſhe wrote a long letter to him, which has been publiſhed by Dr. Birch (21), but which her diffidence prevented her from ever ſending to that celebrated poet.

In her remarks on the writers concerning the foundation of morality, Mrs. Cockburn maintained the opinion of Dr. Samuel Clarke, that there are eternal and immutable relations, eſſential differences of things, and fitneſſes reſulting from them, independently of the will of God, which are obligatory on all reaſonable beings, antecedently to any poſitive appointment, or declaration of the will of God concerning them. She ſpeaks very reſpectfully of the writers ſhe oppoſes, particularly of Dr. Warburton, the late biſhop of Glouceſter, Dr. Law, the preſent learned biſhop of Carliſle, and Dr. Watts. Of the latter, whoſe notion of ſubſtance ſhe controverted, ſhe ſays, that " his " candour in repreſenting the ſide he oppoſes, and " his modeſty in defending his own opinion, are very " inſinuating (22)."

[R] She had the misfortune this year to loſe a daughter.] Of this affliction ſhe ſpeaks in the following terms, in one of her letters to her niece, Mrs. Arbuthnot. ' The unexpected loſs of my poor child, ' who was ſo uſeful to me, and had been almoſt all ' her life with me, was indeed a ſevere affliction. ' She was a long time every moment in my thoughts. ' Whatever I turned my mind to, ſhe mingled with ' it: all that I found in books, was ſome way or other ' applied to her; and ſtill there is not a day but ſhe ' is frequently the ſubject of my reflections; nor do I ' endeavour to divert them from her, but make the beſt ' uſe I can of them. I ſometimes imagine, that I ' have now a nearer intereſt in another ſtate than I ' had; and pleaſe myſelf with the hopes of joining ' her ſpirit there, and finding her rejoicing in her ' early eſcape from the evils of this world. Some- ' times I conſider, how graciouſly providence often ' makes our diſappointments, and croſſes in one kind, ' turn to our advantage in another. My dear Kitty's ' return to me is an inſtance of this: had ſhe been ' ſettled, as we propoſed, or continued with her bro- ' ther, how deſolate ſhould I have been, when de- ' prived of the only child that was left me! It is ' true, her coming from one ſorrow to another made ' ſome part of my grief; but her being with me, and ' ſharing each other's griefs, was a mighty relief and ' comfort; beſides that ſhe is of the greateſt uſe to ' me. So that I have reaſon to be thankful both for ' her, and the bleſſing I have in the goodneſs of my ' ſon, though at this diſtance from me; and I hope ' God will pleaſe to preſerve them (23).'

[S] Left her ſmall intervals of eaſe.] In a letter to her niece, dated Nov. 20, 1744, is the following paſſage: ' I have very little proſpect of tolerable health ' for any continuance. My cough returned the be- ' ginning of September, and held me about two ' months; but is now ſucceeded by ſuch a difficulty ' of breathing, that I do not know which is moſt ' grievous, but between them I am reduced to great ' weakneſs (24).' And in another letter, to another perſon, dated in Auguſt, 1748, ſhe ſays, ' There are ' about nine months in the year, in which I am un- ' able to write to my neareſt friends, or on the moſt ' important buſineſs: much leſs can I apply myſelf ' to abſtruſe ſpeculations (25).'

(25) Ibid. p. 349.

In a letter to a clergyman, who was of different ſentiments from herſelf, and who appears to have been much prejudiced againſt the opinions of Dr. Clarke, dated March, 1748, ſhe expreſſes herſelf thus: ' Whenever your affairs will allow you to favour me ' with a perſonal conference, I ſhall eſteem it a great ' obligation, as the advantage muſt be wholly on my ' ſide; for you will be much diſappointed, Sir, if you ' expect to encounter an able diſputant. My com- ' panionable capacity (if I may ſo ſpeak) has entirely ' left me; readineſs of thought and expreſſion, ſo ne- ' ceſſary to converſation, are no more; but I can ſtill ' hear with attention, and conſider with impartiality, ' nor am yet too old to learn. Your candour will ' give allowances for the decays of age, and the ill- ' neſſes, that have for ſome years attended it (26).'

(26) Ibid. p. 348.

[T] By that gentleman her performance was ſo much approved.] In a letter to her niece, Mrs. Cockburn ſays, ſpeaking of this piece, ' I have had a letter ' from Mr. Warburton, with an encomium of that ' ſmall performance, far beyond my expectation, as ' he ſays it was beyond his, to hear it was writ by a ' lady. He expreſſes his obligation for the candour ' and politeneſs of that part, in which he is concern- ' ed, and ſtyles it the ſtrongeſt and cleareſt piece of me- ' taphyſics, that ever was written (27)."

" Reaſonings, enforced in the Writings of the late Dr. Samuel Clarke [U]." In the preface to this confutation of Dr. Rutherforth, Mr. Warburton ſays, that it contains " all the clearneſs of expreſſion, the ſtrength of reaſon, the preciſion of logic, and at- " tachment to truth, which makes books of this nature really uſeful to the common " cauſe of virtue and religion." The merit of this performance, and the vivacity, acuteneſs, and ſtrength, which were diſplayed in it, in the diſcuſſion of ſome of the moſt intricate and abſtruſe queſtions, ſoon excited the curioſity of the public reſpecting the concealed writer: and their admiration was greatly increaſed, when her ſex and advanced age were known, ſhe being in her ſixty-eighth year when this piece was publiſhed. The reputation which her writings had procured her, at length induced her friends to propoſe to her, the collecting them together, and publiſhing them by ſubſcription. She conſented to this ſcheme, which was encouraged by many perſons of literary taſte, and particularly by Lady Iſabella Finch (g). But Mrs. Cockburn did not live to diſcharge herſelf the office of editor; which, in conſequence of her death, was afterwards undertaken and executed by Dr. Birch. She loſt her huſband on the 4th of January, 1748-9, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age; and this was ſo ſevere a ſhock to her, that ſhe did not long ſurvive him. She died on the 11th of May, 1749, in her 71ſt year, after having long ſupported a painful diſorder, with the utmoſt patience and reſignation. Her memory and underſtanding continued unimpaired, till within a few days of her death. She was interred, near her huſband and youngeſt daughter, at Long-Horſeley, with this ſhort ſentence on their tomb: Let their works praiſe them in the gates, Prov. xxxi. 31. (h).

In her younger years, Mrs. Cockburn was much celebrated for her beauty, as well as for her genius and other accompliſhments. She was ſmall of ſtature, but was diſtinguiſhed by the unuſual vivacity of her eyes, and the delicacy of her complexion, which continued to her death (i). In her private character ſhe appears to have been ſtrictly virtuous [W], and conſtantly under the influence of a ſincere and rational piety. She was

[U] Remarks upon the principles and reaſonings of Dr. Rutherforth's Eſſay on the nature and obligations of virtue, &c.] Dr. Warburton, in his preface, ſpeaking of Dr. Rutherforth's Eſſay, ſays, in his ſtrong and ſarcaſtic manner, that there was little or nothing in it 'but ſophiſtical wrangling, and diſingenuous 'tergiverſation; embarraſſed by an underſtanding 'more than ordinarily condenſed with the frigid 'ſubtilty of ſchool moonſhine.' Mrs. Cockburn, however, treated Dr. Rutherforth with much more civility. She ſaid of him, that no one, who had engaged on the ſame ſide, 'had laboured with more 'advantages of learning, of plauſible argument, and 'all the arts his cauſe required (28).'

(28) Ibid. p. 8.

Dr. Rutherforth endeavoured to prove, That virtue is that quality in our actions, by which they are fitted to do good to others, or to prevent their harm; that every man's own happineſs is the ultimate end, which nature and reaſon teach him to purſue; and that men neither do purſue, nor does nature or reaſon teach him to purſue, any other end, but every one his own private happineſs. And it having been urged by ſome moraliſts, in proof of the intrinſic excellence of virtue, and of our natural perceptions of its worth, that even thoſe, who do not practiſe it, give teſtimony to it, by their approbation and love of it in others; Dr. Rutherforth ſays, " All that they approve in " virtue or moral goodneſs, is the natural good, " that it either produces, or is fitted to produce; " and all their love ariſes from the ſhare, which " they ſuppoſe they ſhould have in the happy ef- " fects of it, when others practiſe it."

Mrs. Cockburn, on the contrary, maintained, in conformity to the ſentiments of Dr. Clarke, that there are certain fitneſſes, and unfitneſſes, ariſing from the eſſential difference between vice and virtue, which make it our duty to practiſe the one, and avoid the other, even independently of any proſpect of advantage, or reward; and that our natural approbation of virtue is quite diſtinct from, and independent of, all conſideration of the effects of it: and ſhe aſſerted, that Dr. Rutherforth, by denying to mankind all diſintereſted benevolence, and any foundation for the duties of virtue or religion, but the proſpect of advantage or reward, highly injured and diſhonoured both virtue and religion (29).

(29) Ibid. p. 9, 10. 21. 105, &c.

It is obſervable, that Warburton, though he publiſhed Mrs. Cockburn's book, and wrote a preface to it, yet differed from her in opinion with reſpect to the true foundation of morality. He thought her wrong in placing the foundation of moral virtue in the eternal relations of things. His own opinion was, that the Divine Being, in order to ſecure the practice of moral virtue, had beſtowed on man that inſtinctive approbation of right, and abhorrence of wrong, to which ſome philoſophers have given the name of the moral ſenſe; and that God had farther eſtabliſhed a real, eſſential difference, in the qualities of human actions, whereby ſome are ſeen to be fit and right, and others wrong and unfit. But as Mr. Warburton thought, that obligation without an obliger, and an obliger without agency, were mere jargon, he therefore had recourſe to a ſuperior will, as the proper and real ground of moral obligation. For he aſſerted, that though inſtinct felt a difference in actions, and reaſon diſcovered that difference to be founded in the nature of things; yet it was will only, that could make compliance with ſuch difference to be our duty; whereby that, which was before a fitneſs, now became a virtue. On theſe three principles, therefore, he ſuppoſed the whole edifice of practical morality to be erected. However, this admirable proviſion for the ſupport of virtue, was, he ſaid, in great meaſure, defeated by its pretended advocates; who, in their ſquabbles about the true foundation of morality, and the obligations to its practice, had ſacrilegiouſly untwiſted this threefold cord. But of Mrs. Cockburn he ſaid, that though ſhe had placed the foundation of moral virtue, as he thought wrongly, in the eternal relations of things; yet, by allowing the other principles all their efficacy, ſhe had wiſely ſecured the intereſts of practical morality. 'And by this means,' ſays he, 'ſeconded by a fine genius, and infinite ſu- 'periority in reaſoning, this writer (Mrs. Cockburn) 'hath given ſo thorough a confutation of the ex- 'cluſive, exterminating ſyſtem (of Dr. Rutherforth), 'as is rarely to be met with in controverſies on theſe 'ſubjects (30).'

(30) Pref. to Mrs. Cockburn's Remarks, p. 1, 2.

[W] In her private character ſhe appears to have been ſtrictly virtuous.] But Dr. Birch obſerves, that 'unexceptionable as her character was in all reſpects, 'from a conduct throughout life ſtrictly conformable 'to thoſe principles of morality and religion, of 'which ſhe had the fulleſt and moſt rational convic- 'tion; it could not ſecure her from the malignity 'of a writer of her own ſex, in that comprehenſive 'body of ſcandalous hiſtory, intitled the Atalantis, 'and in the Adventures of Rivella, or the Hiſtory of 'the was benevolent and generous; and remarkable for the uncommon evenneſs and chearfulneſs of her temper. Her converſation was innocent, agreeable, and inſtructive: ſhe had not the leaſt affectation of being thought a wit; but was modeſt and diffident, and conſtantly endeavoured to adapt her diſcourſe to her company (k). It is much to be regretted, that this excellent, ingenious, and amiable woman, did not meet with more liberal patronage among the great, to many of whom ſhe was not unknown. But they ſeem, in general, to have contented themſelves with ſpeaking well of her, without taking much pains to afford her any effectual aſſiſtance. Throughout the whole courſe of her life, ſhe ſeems to have been in very narrow and ſtraitened circumſtances; and after her marriage, ſhe had little leiſure for ſtudy, and was very ill provided with books (l). But ſhe endured the inconveniencies of her ſituation, with a patience and fortitude that were truly exemplary. It is juſtly obſerved by Dr. Birch, that 'her abilities as a writer, and the merit of her works, will not have full juſtice done them, 'without a due attention to the peculiar circumſtances in which they were produced; 'her early youth, when ſhe wrote ſome; her very advanced age, and ill ſtate of health, 'when ſhe drew up others; the uneaſy ſituation of her fortune, during the whole courſe 'of her life; and an interval of near twenty years, in the vigour of it, ſpent in the 'cares of a family, without the leaſt leiſure for reading or contemplation. After 'which, with a mind ſo long diverted and encumbered, reſuming her ſtudies, ſhe 'inſtantly recovered its entire powers, and in the hours of relaxation from her domeſtic 'employments, purſued, to their utmoſt limits, ſome of the deepeſt enquiries of which 'the human mind is capable (m).' It was in the year 1751, that her works were publiſhed by Dr. Birch, in two volumes, octavo, under the following title: "The Works "of Mrs. Catharine Cockburn, theological, moral, dramatic, and poetical." None of her dramatic pieces were included in this collection, excepting "the Fatal Friend-"ſhip;" it being found, that all her writings could not be comprized in the two volumes propoſed to be printed for thoſe who had ſubſcribed for her works, and therefore the preference was given to her performances in proſe. Beſides the other pieces already mentioned, in the courſe of this account of her life, Dr. Birch's collection contains, a letter of advice to her ſon; letters between Dr. Sharp, Archdeacon of Northumberland, and Prebendary of Durham, and Mrs. Cockburn, concerning the foundation of moral virtue; letters between Mrs. Cockburn and ſeveral of her friends; and ſome ſhort eſſays in proſe, with ſeveral ſongs [X], and other poems.] T.

CODRINGTON (CHRISTOPHER), a brave Soldier, and a man of great politeneſs and conſiderable learning, was born at Barbadoes in the year 1668. He had his firſt education in that iſland; but, as ſoon as he was of age to undergo the hardſhips of a voyage, he was ſent to England; and, after ſome ſtay at a good private ſchool at Enfield, under the care of Dr. Wedale, removed to Chriſt-Church in Oxford (a), where he was entered Gentleman Commoner, July 3, 1685 (b). Having taken there one degree in Arts, he was admitted Probationer Fellow of All Souls-College in 1689 (c): wherein he ſo induſtriouſly improved the fine opportunity he had of ſtoring his underſtanding with all ſorts of learning, that he became not only perfect in Logick, Hiſtory, and the learned and modern languages, but alſo in Poetry, Phyſick, and Divinity. Nor was he leſs careful of thoſe politer exerciſes and accompliſhments, which might qualify him to appear in the world, and at the niceſt courts, with reputation and advantage: inſomuch, that he ſoon acquired the deſerved character of an accompliſhed well-bred gentleman, and univerſal ſcholar. Thus qualified, he betook himſelf to the army, but without quitting his fellowſhip; and his merit and courage ſoon recommended him to his Prince's favour (d): for he was made Captain in the firſt regiment of foot-guards (e); and and seems to have been instrumental in driving the French out of the island of St. Christopher's, which they had seized at the breaking out of the war between France and England (f). But it is more certain that he was at the siege of Namur, in 1695 (g). Upon the conclusion of the peace of Ryswick, he was made Captain-General, and Governor in Chief, of the Leeward Caribbee Islands (h): in which station he had not the happiness of pleasing all, or escaping censure; a thing indeed very difficult; or rather next to impossible! For, in 1701, several articles were exhibited against him to the House of Commons in England [A]; to which was published a distinct and particular answer. And at the end are subjoined two attestations from the Lieutenant-Governor, Members of the Council, and the Representatives, of Nevis [B], very much in his favour.

(h) Gordon, ubi supra.

[A] Several Articles were exhibited against him to the House of Commons in England.] They were XV in number, and tended to charge him with violence, and arbitrary proceedings. As for instance, That having, by the King's Commission and Instructions, power and authority with the Council of the respective Islands under his government, to hear and determine appeals brought before him and them, from the Courts of the said islands; and by the nature of such power and authority ought not to sit and preside in the Courts where such suits are depending; yet he, contrary to the nature of his said Commission and Instructions, and the duty of his place, had sate on the Bench with the Chief Justice and other the Judges in the said Courts, and interested himself in private causes, wherein matters of freehold and titles of land were in controversy, arguing both with the Bench and the Bar in favour of one of the parties. That after an Appeal had been prayed and granted by the said Courts, which is in its nature a Supersedeas to the execution until such appeal be heard; yet, by his order, immediate execution had been granted: and he had treated petitions about appeals as libels; and declared he would not hear them. That letters Patents and other deeds, relating to some persons titles, having been enrolled in the Secretaries Office of the island where the lands lie, according to law and usual custom; he had in passion torn the said Patents, deeds, and writings, out of the said register; and had thereupon encouraged persons pretending a title to those lands, forcibly to take possession of them. Moreover, that he had forcibly and arbitrarily seized a plantation, without any legal trial, but only upon a pretended conviction by the view of the Justices. That he had issued out his warrants under his hand, commanding and requiring persons under his government, to appear at their peril before him to answer matters of freehold and titles of land. That when he was petitioned for remedy against some irregular and unlawful acts and orders made by former Governors in chief of the said islands, he had refused to grant any redress therein, declaring he would justify all they had done. That when he suspected such order would not be made, or rule given, by the Judges, as he desired, he had risen from the Bench, and in a public manner declared, that he was sorry he had given them their commissions. That when exceptions were taken at the commission granted by him to the Judges of the Court of Nisi Prius, he had openly declared, he would justify it; and had ordered, that no copy should be given of the same. That he did usually in his discourses abuse and vilify his Majesty's officers in the said islands in the most gross and abusive language imaginable, slighting their authority and magnifying his own, daily affronting and discouraging them in the execution of their several offices, &c. That after seizure of ships, as trading to the Caribbee islands contrary to the Act of Navigation, and the acquittal of them by the Court of Admiralty; he had caused an appeal from that sentence to be brought before himself alone, and had reversed the said sentence of acquittal; out of a covetous desire to get one third part of the full value of the seized ship, which by the said Act is given to the Chief Governor of the said islands. That whereas by his instructions he was required to transmit authentic copies, under the public seal, of all laws and ordinances, made within the respective islands under his government, to his Majesty and the Commissioners of Trade and foreign Plantations, within three months or sooner after their being enacted; yet he had omitted or refused to transmit several Acts made by himself and the Assembly of the island of St. Christopher's, and notwithstanding such omission, had put the said laws, &c. in full execution there, even to the raising of money.——These Articles were printed at London in 1702, 4*to*. with a distinct answer to each Article; (too long to be inserted here) which answer concludes in these words. 'The gentleman who is 'accused of so many and high misdemeanours had in 'Europe a very fair and honourable character; and 'if the general testimony of Councils and Assemblies, 'and also of particular persons who come or write 'from the Leeward islands, a few who are disobliged excepted, may be relied on, he has increased it 'there; and by a speedy and impartial distribution 'of Justice, has gained an universal esteem: and were 'therefore the accusations against him better supported than by the evidence of a person so highly prejudiced [Mr. Mead] who is one of the petitioners, 'and concerned in point of interest in most of the 'matters complained of, it will be still just and reasonable that he should first be allowed an opportunity of making his own defence, before any kind 'of censure pass to the prejudice either of his interest 'or reputation; for it is very easy to dress up a specious complaint against any man at a distance, which 'his friends who are strangers to the matter may be 'entirely unable to give answer to; and it is certain 'that in the present case, had it not been for some 'very accidental notice and information in some of 'the matters complained of, this accusation would 'have appeared much more to the disadvantage of 'Col. Codrington than it is presumed it now will, 'even in the light it is at present set, without the 'least information or instruction from him.'

[B] And at the end are subjoined two attestations, &c.] The first, which is from the Lieutenant-Governour, and Members of the King's Council, of Nevis, runs thus. 'Whereas his Majesty has been 'graciously pleased to appoint Christopher Codrington, Esq; Captain-General and Commander in 'Chief over all his Majesties Leeward islands, to the 'great satisfaction of us his Majesties subjects of this 'island, and that the said Captain-General had justly 'merited the thanks of this island, and character of a 'good Governour, We the Lieutenant Governour, 'and Members of his Majesties Council of this island, 'do hereby testifie and declare, that his said Excellency our Captain-General and Chief Governour 'hath ever since his happy arrival to this government, 'and particularly to this island, constantly employed 'himself for the public good thereof, without regard 'to any private interest; that he hath caused good 'laws to be made, and the laws in general to be put 'in execution without favour or affection, hatred or 'malice to any; and that he has in reference to the 'preservation of these islands in case of a war, used 'all means for their being put in a due posture of defence, and for the more effectual performance of 'which in true zeal for his Majesties service, he hath 'been himself present at each island; wherefore his 'great Vertues, Honour, and Reputation being 'highly advantageous to this government which is 'divided into several islands, and therefore has need 'in war of a most sure conduct, we humbly hope and 'request that no frivolous nor scandalous complaints 'may be heard against him, he having deserved no 'such treatment since his being with us. Dated in 'the Council-Chamber, in Charles Town, the 9th 'day of July 1701.'

The other attestation, or certificate, is from the Representatives of Nevis; wherein they certified, favour. In the year 1703, he was at the attack upon Guadaloupe, belonging to the French (i); in which he ſhewed great bravery, though that enterprize happened to be unſucceſsful. Some time after, he reſigned his government of the Leeward-Iſlands, and lived in a ſtudious and retired condition (k). He died, at his ſeat in Barbadoes, on Good-Friday, April 7, 1710; and was buried the day following, in the pariſh church of St. Michael, in that iſland; but his body was afterwards brought over to England, and interred, on the 19th of June, 1716, in the chapel of All Souls-College in Oxford, wherein two Latin orations to his memory were ſpoken by two Fellows of that College; the one by Digby Cotes, M. A. the Univerſity-Orator, at his interment; the other the next day by Edward Young, LL. B. at the laying of the foundation-ſtone of his library (l). Over his grave a black marble ſtone was ſoon after laid, whereon there is no other inſcription but CODRINGTON (m). By his laſt will, he bequeated his two plantations in Barbadoes, and part of the Iſland of Barbuda, to the Society for the Propagation of the Goſpel in foreign Parts [C]: and alſo left a very handſome legacy to All Souls-College, of which he had been Fellow [D]. He might be author of ſeveral things; but there is nothing, as far as we can find, publiſhed under his name, excepting verſes to Sir Samuel Garth, in praiſe of his excellent Poem the Diſpenſary [E]. We ſhall give his character in the note [F].

That his Excellency Chriſtopher Codrington, Eſq; their Captain-General and Chief Governor, had all along ſince his arrival and being in his government, acted and behaved himſelf with great zeal and vigour for his Majeſty's ſervice, and for the real good of that iſland, by paſſing all ſuch wholſome and convenient laws as the Lieutenant-Governor, Council, and Aſſembly had thought fit to prepare and offer, by adminiſtring true juſtice and right judgment, impartially without favour or affection, profit or gain, to all both rich and poor; ſo that he had moſt juſtly acquired a laudable and honourable reputation, and might without the leaſt flattery be ſtiled a good and careful General, an honeſt and prudent Governor, a true and upright Judge to them, &c.

[C] By his laſt will, he bequeathed his two plantations in Barbadoes, and part of the iſland of Barbuda, to the Society for the Propagation of the Goſpel in foreign parts.] And deſired, That the plantations ſhould continue entire; and three hundred Negroes at leaſt be always kept thereon. The uſes he chiefly appropriated this great benefaction to, was, for building a college in Barbadoes; in which he appointed, that a convenient number of Profeſſors and Scholars ſhould be maintained: who are to be obliged to ſtudy and practiſe Phyſic and Chirurgery, as well as Divinity: That by the apparent uſefulneſs of the former (as the Will ran) they might endear themſelves to the people, and have the better opportunities of doing good to men's ſouls, while they are taking care of their bodies (1). This gift is valued at two thouſand pounds a year, clear of all charges (2).

[E] There is nothing, as far as we can find, publiſhed under his name, excepting verſes to Sir Samuel Garth, in praiſe of his excellent Poem the Diſpenſary.] They are intituled, 'To my friend the author, deſiring my opi-'nion of his Poem.' And begin thus,

Aſk me not, friend, what I approve or blame,
Perhaps I know not why I like, or damn;
I can be pleaſed; and I dare own I am.

I read Thee over with a lover's eye,
Thou haſt no faults; or I no faults can ſpy;
Thou art all beauty, or all blindneſs I, &c.

We have obſerved, ſince the above was written, that he had a hand in Auctio Daviſiana, &c. printed in the Muſæ Anglicanæ, edit. Lond. 1741, 8vo. pag. 173, &c.

[F] We ſhall give his character, &c.] Being as follows: 'Nature had bleſſed him with vaſt capacious 'parts, exceedingly above the common level of man-'kind. He had a great ſoul, of a fiery genius, happily united to a body of a ſubtle and flexible compoſition, in which the blood and animal ſpirits 'moved with vigour and rapidity, and rendered it 'rather a ſpur, than an hindrance to the operations 'of his mind. He had a quick and piercing appre-'henſion, a ſtrong, ſolid, diſtinguiſhing judgment, a 'retentive memory, a warm imagination, a fruitful 'ſagacious invention, a bold pregnant wit, a ſublime 'way of thinking, a methodical perſuaſive way of 'reaſoning, and a voluble diſtinct utterance, upon 'the moſt unexpected occaſions. After having re-'ſigned his government, he led a very private retired 'life, and ſpent moſt of his time in contemplation 'and ſtudy. For a few years before his death, he 'chiefly applied himſelf to Church-Hiſtory and Me-'taphyſicks. If he excelled in any thing, it was in 'metaphyſical learning, of which he was, perhaps, 'the greateſt maſter in the world. He was a great 'admirer of the Fathers, particularly of St. Baſil, 'whom he ſeems not a little to have reſembled, in 'the univerſality of his genius, the warmth and activity of his temper, and affection for a monaſtic 'life; but chiefly in his eloquent ſublime way of 'ſpeaking and writing. He was particularly careful 'to form his ſtyle upon the great models of antiquity, 'ſome of whom he equalled, and moſt of them excelled. His ſtyle was plain and eaſy, yet powerful 'and lofty; fluent, but not turgid; florid, yet natural and unaffected; elegant, but not overwrought 'or forced. In his ſtudied and elaborate compoſures, 'there was an inimitable beauty and efficacy, whereby 'he would, at once, charm the affections, move the 'paſſions, and convince the underſtanding, with ſuch 'ſurprizing turns, impetuous force, and ſolid reaſons, that, as was ſaid of his forementioned pattern, 'he ſpoke nothing but life, and breathed a ſoul in 'the dulleſt argument he treated of; and yet his care 'of his ſtyle, did not at all cramp the exactneſs, or 'interrupt the chain of his moſt refined and abſtracted 'enquiries; for every thought was placed in the moſt 'advantageous light, as well as dreſſed in the gayeſt 'manner; and every period was juſt, and had a natural cadence. In the ſame diſcourſe, he would 'diſplay the Orator and the Philoſopher, to ſo great 'perfection, that it was hard to determine in which 'he

' he moſt excelled, ſo much did he excel in both. In ' a word, he had, in his Weſt-India retirement, made ' ſo wonderful a progreſs in his ſtudies, that had he ' lived to have returned to his beloved Univerſity, ' he would have been as much the object of their ad- ' miration, as he deſerved to be the object of their ' delight. He was ſo great a lover of learning, and ' learned men, that wherever he met with an inge- ' nious perſon, he courted his acquaintance, and ' readily received him into his friendſhip (4).'

 [In Cibber's Lives of the Poets, a place is given to Governor Codrington, who is repreſented as having written ſome ſmall pieces of poetry with much elegance and politeneſs, and is ſaid to have been a gentleman of the firſt rank of wit and gallantry (5). The ſpecimen, however, which is inſerted of his talents, from his Epilogue to Southern's tragedy, entitled, "The Fate of Capua," reflects but little credit on the Governor's poetical abilities, and, at the ſame time, affords no recommendation to the delicacy of his ſentiments. The two lines in the verſes to Garth, have been uncommonly fortunate, and obtained a celebrity which hath almoſt rendered them proverbial, ſo often have they been quoted. But this is not owing to any extraordinary poetical excellence in the lines themſelves, but to their happily expreſſing the ſituation of the minds of lovers, with regard to their miſtreſſes.

" Thou art all beauty, or all blindneſs I,"

Biographers are often obliged to draw materials from funeral eulogiums: but then theſe eulogiums are to be received with a due degree of caution. Without calling in queſtion the general truth of the character which is given of Governor Codrington, in note [F], we cannot avoid thinking, that the praiſe, in one or two caſes, is carried to an extravagant height. Can any one, for inſtance, believe, that in metaphyſical learning, he was perhaps the greateſt maſter in the world? It is not much more credible, that, in his ſtyle of compoſition, he equalled ſome of the great models of antiquity, and excelled moſt of them. If he had poſſeſſed ſuch ſupereminent qualities, more ſtriking proofs of them would probably have been exhibited to the public. It muſt be ſuppoſed, that Mr. Gordon, the preacher of the Governor's funeral ſermon, was influenced by a ſenſe of gratitude for perſonal obligations. Mr. Codrington's noble benefactions to the Society for the Propagation of the Goſpel in foreign Parts, and to All Souls-College in Oxford, are the things which have completed his title to an honourable place in the Biographia Britannica.] K.

COKE, or COOKE (JOHN), Secretary of State in King Charles the Firſt's reign, was a younger brother of Sir Francis Cooke, and born at Truſley in Derbyſhire, of an antient family there, allied to the beſt in that country (a). He was probably educated at Weſtminſter ſchool; and on the 22d of April, 1580, admitted Scholar of Trinity-College in Cambridge. After having taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was choſen Fellow of the ſame College, about the 4th of April, 1584 (b). He continued long in the Univerſity (c); and being taken notice of for his learning, was choſen public Profeſſor of Rhetoric: in which employment he ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ingenious and critical lectures, that Rhetoric ſeemed not to be ſo much an art to him, as his nature. Then he travelled beyond the ſeas for ſome time, in the company of a perſon of quality, and returned rich in languages, remarks, and experience: having avoided all the dangers incident to him on account of his religion, by this prudent declaration, that he came to learn, and not to ſearch (d). Afterwards he retired into the country in the condition of a private gentleman, till after he was fifty years of age; when, upon ſome reputation he had for induſtry and diligence, he was called to ſome painful employment in the office of the navy, which he diſcharged well, and was made Secretary thereof. Afterwards, partly through his own merit, and partly through the intereſt of Fulk Greville, Lord Brook, to whom he was related, he was made Maſter of the Requeſts; and at laſt Secretary of State, about the year 1620, in the room of Sir Albert Moreton, deceaſed. He was alſo knighted (e). In the firſt and third Parliaments of King Charles I. he was one of the repreſentatives for the Univerſity of Cambridge (f); and made ſeveral ſpeeches in Parliament [A]. He governed himſelf in the management of his places by the following rules: That no man ſhould let what is unjuſtifiable or dangerous appear under his hand, to give envy a ſteady aim at his place or perſon; nor mingle intereſts with great men, made deſperate by debts or court-injuries, whoſe falls have been ruinous to their wiſeſt followers; nor pry any farther into ſecrecy, than rather to ſecure than ſhew himſelf; nor impart that to a friend, which may impower him to be an enemy (g). He likewiſe kept himſelf ſtrictly to the law of the land [B]. But, notwithſtanding his great caution, on the 8th of November, 1641, a Meſſenger of the Houſe of Commons was ſent to fetch him up out of Derbyſhire, to anſwer ſome complaints made againſt him, about ſome commitments in the year 1628 (h).

He is alſo accuſed, though unjuſtly, of having put into the King's hands a paper from the Scots, inſtead of the genuine Articles of Pacification at York: and to have ſo far complied with the change of the times, as to have brought propoſitions from the Parliament to the King, as actively, as formerly he had carried meſſages from the King to the Parliament (i). However, after having continued Secretary of State about twenty years (k), he was removed to make room for Sir Henry Vane (l); and died the 8th of September, 1644 (m). With regard to his character: we are informed, that he was a grave and prudent man, in gait, apparel, and ſpeech; one that had his intellectuals very perfect in the diſpatch of buſineſs, till he was eighty years old (n). He is alſo ſaid to have been a very zealous Proteſtant, and to have done all good offices for the advancement of true religion (o). But the Lord Clarendon, who ſeems to have had a prejudice againſt him, gives him a more unfavourable character. He was, ſays he (p), a man rather unadorned with any parts of vigour and quickneſs, and unendowed with any notable virtues, than notorious for any weakneſs or defect of underſtanding, or tranſported with any vicious inclinations; appetite to money only excepted. His cardinal perfection was induſtry, and his moſt eminent infirmity covetouſneſs. His long experience had informed him well of the ſtate and affairs in England; but of foreign tranſactions, or the common intereſt of Chriſtian Princes, he was entirely undiſcerning and ignorant. But another, to ſoften his character, ſays (q), he had an happy mixture of diſcretion and charity, whereby he could allow to things and perſons more than men of ſtreighter apprehenſions, or narrower affections, were able to do. He had a brother named

 [In the collection of the Clarendon Papers, printed ſome few years ſince at Oxford, under the direction of Dr. Scrope, a conſiderable number of letters may be met with, written by Sir John Coke, when Secretary of State. A farther ſpecimen of his political abilities may be ſeen in the "Miſcellaneous State Papers," lately publiſhed by the Earl of Hardwicke. We there find four letters of Sir John Coke's to Sir Belthazar Gerbier, relative to a ſecret treaty carried on with the Flemings in 1632, which has never appeared in our hiſtories, and which, indeed, was totally unknown to the public, till brought to light by the learned and noble Lord juſt mentioned. From theſe letters it appears, that Sir John Coke wrote his diſpatches with perſpicuity, and in a ſtyle becoming a man of buſineſs. We apprehend, that the Earl of Clarendon was under the influence of prejudice, when he repreſented him as entirely undiſcerning, and ignorant, of foreign tranſactions, or the common intereſt of Chriſtian Princes. The contrary is manifeſt, from the ſecond of the letters now referred to, which ſhews, that he was well acquainted with the views of Holland, France, and Spain, and reflects honour on his ſagacity (3).

Sir John Coke made a conſiderable figure in the third Parliament of King Charles the Firſt, which met on the 17th of March, 1627-8, and was diſſolved on the 10th of March following. In this important and buſy Parliament, our Secretary appears to have conducted himſelf with ſuch moderation, that he did not incur the diſpleaſure of the Houſe. Though he was often obliged to deliver, in his official capacity, meſſages which were far from being agreeable to the Commons, he took care to do it with a diſcretion and lenity that ſecured him from perſonal reſentment. From the ſpeeches he made, we ſhall ſelect one ſhort ſpecimen of his parliamentary capacity. It was ſpoken on the 22d of March, 1627-8; and the deſign of it was to engage the Houſe of Commons to begin with the ſupply. "I had rather you would "hear any man than me. I will not anſwer what "hath been already ſpoken. My intent is not to "ſtir, but to quiet; not to provoke, but to appeaſe. "My deſire is, that every one reſort to his own heart "to re-unite the King and the State, and to take "away the ſcandal from us. Every one ſpeaks from "the abundance of his heart: I do conclude, out "of every one's concluſion, both to give to the "King, and to redreſs grievances; all the difference "is about the manner. We are all inhabitants in "one houſe, the Commonwealth: let every one "amend his own houſe, for ſomewhat is amiſs in "every one: but if all the houſe be on fire, will ye "then think of amending what is amiſs? Will ye "not rather quench the fire? The danger all apprehend; the way that is propounded, I ſeek not to "decline. Illegal courſes have been taken, it muſt "be confeſſed; the redreſs muſt be by laws and puniſhment: but, withal, add the law of neceſſity: "neceſſity hath no law; you muſt enable the State "to do, what you do, by petition, require. It is "wiſhed, that we begin with grievances: I deny "not that we prepare them, but ſhall we offer them "firſt? Will not this ſeem a condition with his Majeſty? Do we not deal with a wiſe King, jealous "of his honour? All the ſubſidies we can give cannot advantage his Majeſty ſo much, as that his "ſubjects do chearfully agree to ſupply him. This "will amaze the enemy more than ten ſubſidies: "begin, therefore, with the King, and not with "ourſelves (4)."

Several more of Sir John Coke's ſpeeches may be read in the ſeventh and eighth volumes of the Parliamentary Hiſtory.

After the ſubſidies were granted, Mr. Secretary Coke made the following report to the Houſe, of the King's acceptance of them: "His Majeſty was "pleaſed to aſk, By how many voices they were gained? I ſaid, but by one. His Majeſty aſked, How many were againſt him? I ſaid, none; for they were voted by one voice, and one general conſent (5)." The King was ſo much affected by the generoſity of the Commons, that he expreſſed a great love for Parliaments, and a deſire often to meet his people in that way: but this good underſtanding between them did not long continue.] K.

COKE (SIR EDWARD), Lord Chief Juſtice of England, and one of the moſt eminent Lawyers this kingdom has produced. His father was Robert Coke, Eſq; of Mileham, in the county of Norfolk, himſelf a learned profeſſor of the Law, a Barriſter of great practice, and a Bencher of Lincoln's-Inn (a). His mother's name was Winifred, daughter and co-heireſs of William Knightley, of Morgrave-Knightley, in the county of Norfolk (b); ſo that in point of deſcent, he might be juſtly eſteemed of a good family, in a county where there are as many good families as in any other in the kingdom [A]. He was born at his father's ſeat at Mileham, in the year 1550, and had all the care taken of him in his infancy that could be beſtowed by a tender mother, for whoſe memory he had always the higheſt veneration. At the age of ten he was ſent to the free-ſchool at Norwich, then eſteemed one of the beſt in England, where, under the care of Mr. Walter Hawe (c), and by his own ſingular diligence and application, he made a very great proficiency. His next remove was to Trinity-College in Cambridge, where, if a certain author might be relied on, he had Dr. George Whitgift for his tutor (d); but that ſeems to be improbable, for Dr. Whitgift was Fellow of Peter-Houſe (e), and became Maſter of Trinity-College, about the time that Mr. Coke became a member of the Univerſity (f), which is ſufficient to juſtify the fact for which he is mentioned as his tutor, and of which we ſhall hereafter take notice. He remained in the Univerſity about four years, and was then removed to Clifford's-Inn; the year after which he was entered a Student of the Inner-Temple. He had not been long there before he gave a very extraordinary proof of the quickneſs of his penetration, and the ſolidity of his judgment. This was with regard to the Cook's caſe of the Temple, which had puzzled the whole Houſe, and which he ſtated ſo exactly, that it was taken notice of and admired by the Bench (g). It is not at all improbable, that this might promote his being early called to the Bar, as he was at ſix years ſtanding, which, in thoſe ſtrict times, was held very extraordinary (h). We are told by himſelf, that the firſt cauſe in which he appeared in the Court of Queen's Bench, was in Trinity term 1578, and it was a very remarkable one (i) [B]. About this time he was appointed Reader of Lyon's-Inn, and ſo continued for three years, during which ſpace his lectures were much reſorted to, his reputation increaſed, and with it his practice; ſo that when he had been [A] Where there are as many good families as in any other in the kingdom.] It appears, from a pedigree of this family drawn by the learned Camden, that William Coke was ſeated at Doddington, in the county of Norfolk, in the 8th of King John, that is, in the year 1206 (1); from whom deſcended lineally, Sir Thomas Coke, Knt. who flouriſhed in the reign of King Edward III. and his eldeſt ſon Sir Thomas Coke the younger, Knight, who for his wiſdom was made Seneſchal of Gaſcoigne (2); and for his valour a Knight Banneret, but he died before his father. Robert Coke, the grandſon of Sir Thomas Coke the elder, married a lady of a conſiderable fortune, and by her had iſſue John, who was the father of Thomas Coke, by whoſe intermarriage with Alice, daughter of William Falcard, Lord of Sparham and Stivekey-Hall (3), thoſe eſtates, or at leaſt the greateſt part of them, came to their ſon Robert Coke, who married Anne, daughter of Thomas Woodhouſe, Eſq; by whom he had two ſons and two daughters; and his eldeſt ſon, Robert Coke, was the father of Sir Edward, of whom we are ſpeaking; who by the lady mentioned in the text, had this only ſon and ſeven daughters, who all lived to be married (4). As for this Robert Coke, Eſq; he died November 15, 1657, at his chambers in Lincoln's-inn, while his ſon was at Norwich ſchool; who, in honour of his memory, cauſed a fair monument be erected, many years after, in the pariſh church of St. Andrew's, Holborn, with an inſcription, from which moſt of theſe particulars are taken.

[B] In Trinity term 1578, and it was a very remarkable one.] Mr. Edward Denny was Vicar of Northlinham, in the county of Norfolk, and the then Lord Cromwell, who lived near him, procured two perſons to preach ſeveral ſermons in his church, in which they inveighed againſt the book of Common Prayer, ſtyling it ſuperſtitious and impious. For this reaſon, when one of them came next to preach, the Vicar, knowing he had no licence, would have hindered him; but being ſupported by Lord Cromwell, he proceeded, and did preach. Upon this occaſion ſome warm words paſſed between Lord Cromwell and the Vicar; the former ſaying, Thou art a falſe varlet, and I like not of thee; to which the latter replied, It is no marvel though you like not of me, for you like of theſe, meaning the preachers, that maintain ſedition againſt the Queen's proceedings. Upon this Lord Cromwell brought his action, upon the ſtatute de ſcandalis magnatum. The defendant juſtified, upon which the plaintiff demurred, and the bar was held inſufficient; but upon a motion in arreſt of judgment, that the declaration was inſufficient, the court gave judgment for the defendant. Upon this Lord Cromwell brought another action, and amended his declaration, and then the court was moved, that the words were not actionable, becauſe they might be taken in a milder ſenſe; but the court delivered no opinion, but ſaid to the defendant's council, be well adviſed, and plead or demur at your pleaſure; whereupon they pleaded a ſpecial juſtification, and ſet it forth in the manner before recited; to which the plaintiff's council took exception, for two reaſons: Firſt, That the matter of juſtification was inſufficient, becauſe ſedition cannot be committed by words, but by public and violent actions: Secondly, If the matter of juſtification was ſufficient, then the defendant was not guilty, and ought ſo to plead. The court however held, that the juſtification was good, and that the defendant ſhould not be driven to the general iſſue. Afterwards the matter in diſpute was compromiſed between the parties. Our author's obſervations upon this, will ſhew the excellence of his method in reporting, which acquired him ſo high a reputation in his own time, and which has been deſervedly admired and applauded ever ſince (5). 'In this caſe, reader, you 'may obſerve an excellent point of learning in actions 'for ſlander, to obſerve the occaſion and cauſe of 'ſpeaking of them, and how it may be pleaded in 'the defendant's excuſe. 2. When the matter of fact 'will clearly ſerve for your client, although your 'opinion is, that the plaintiff has no cauſe of action, 'yet take heed you do not hazard the matter upon a 'demurrer; in which upon the pleading and otherwiſe, more perhaps will ariſe than you thought of; 'but firſt take advantage of the matters of fact, and 'leave matters in law, which always ariſe upon the 'matters in fact ad ultimum, and never at firſt demur 'in law; when after trial of the matters in fact, the 'matters in law (as in this caſe it was) will be ſaved 'to you.'

at the bar a few years, he thought himſelf in a condition to form pretences to a lady of one of the beſt families, and at the ſame time of the beſt fortune, in the county of Norfolk (k). This lady's name was Bridget, daughter and co-heireſs of John Paſton, Eſq; whom he ſoon married, and with whom he had, firſt and laſt, thirty thouſand pounds (l) [C]. After this marriage, by which he became allied to ſome of the nobleſt houſes in the kingdom, he began to riſe faſter by much than was uſual in thoſe times; for the cities of Coventry and Norwich (m) choſe him their Recorder: he was in all the great cauſes of Weſtminſter-Hall, was in high credit with the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh (n), and was frequently conſulted in the Queen's affairs. His large eſtate, and his great credit in his country, as well as at court, recommended him to the freeholders of his county, by whom he was choſen Knight of the ſhire; and in the Parliament held in the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, he was choſen Speaker (o), being at that time the Queen's Solicitor, which was beſtowed upon him in 1592 (p), and very ſoon after he was advanced to the poſt of Attorney-General. Some time after this he loſt his wife, by whom he had ten children, which gave him an opportunity of making his addreſſes to another lady of great fortune and quality, viz. the Lady Hatton, relict of Sir William Hatton, and ſiſter to Thomas Lord Burleigh, afterwards Earl of Exeter; which marriage, as it was afterwards the ſource of many inconveniences and troubles to both parties, ſo the very celebration of it occaſioned no ſmall noiſe and diſquiet, by a very unlucky accident that attended it. There had been the ſame year, which was 1598, ſo much notice taken of irregular marriages, that Archbiſhop Whitgift had ſignified to the Biſhops of his province, that he expected they ſhould be very diligent in cauſing all ſuch perſons to be proſecuted as were guilty of any irregularity in the celebration of marriage, in point of time, form, or place (q). But whether it was that Mr. Coke looked upon his own and the Lady's quality, and their being married with the conſent of the family, as ſetting them above ſuch reſtrictions, or whether he did not advert to them, certain it is, that they were married in a private houſe, without either banns or licenſe; upon which Mr. Coke and his new-married Lady, Mr. Henry Bothwel, Rector of Okeover, in the county of Rutland, Thomas Lord Burleigh, and ſeveral other perſons, were proſecuted in the Archbiſhop's Court; but upon their ſubmiſſion by their proxies, were abſolved from the greater excommunications, and the conſequent penalties which they had incurred, by overlooking the authority of the Church; becauſe, ſays the record, they had offended, not out of contumacy, but through ignorance of the law in that point (r). It cannot be conceived, that there was any thing either of extraordinary ſeverity, or of perſonal prejudice, in the Archbiſhop, but rather the contrary: for upon Mr. Coke's being made the Queen's Attorney-General, we are told that he ſent him a fair Greek Teſtament, with this meſſage, That he had ſtudied the Common Law long enough, and that he ſhould thereafter ſtudy the Law of God (s); neither was it likely that Mr. Coke meant any contempt of the Church, ſince it clearly appears, that he was, upon all occaſions, a very faſt friend both to it and to the Clergy; as is more eſpecially evident from an extraordinary teſtimony given him in that reſpect, by the Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Norwich, to whom he had been very uſeful in his profeſſion, and had ſaved part of their lands from being torn from them by foul practices, and under colour of concealments (t) [D]. His favour to the Clergy was alſo very diſcernible,

[C] With whom he had, firſt and laſt, thirty thouſand pounds.] The Paſtons, of Paſton, in Norfolk, were a very ancient and honourable family, greatly diſtinguiſhed by their ſervices rendered to the crown in almoſt all capacities. William Paſton was Serjeant at Law in the reign of Henry IV. a Judge, and in high favour with King Henry VI. He left a vaſt eſtate to John Paſton, Eſq; his eldeſt ſon, and no ſmall one to William his ſecond ſon, who married Anne, daughter to William Duke of Somerſet (6). Of the ſame line was Sir Clement Paſton, who it is ſaid King Henry VIII. called his champion, the Duke of Somerſet his ſoldier, Queen Mary her ſeaman, and Queen Elizabeth her father (7). As for the father of this lady, he was the third ſon of Sir William Paſton, of Paſton, but was himſelf ſettled at Huntingfield-Hall, in Suffolk (8). His ſiſter Eleanor, married Thomas Earl of Rutland, by whom ſhe had Henry Earl of Rutland, Gertrude Counteſs of Shrewſbury, Anne Counteſs of Weſtmoreland, and Frances Lady Abergavenny; to all which noble families Mr. Coke became allied, by this marriage (9). If therefore we conſider that he had a very large fortune left him by his father; that he had, one way or other, thirty thouſand pounds with this lady; and that from his firſt coming to the bar he was in great buſineſs; to which we may add, that purchaſes were then made at very moderate rates, we need not at all wonder, that in a very few years he acquired a very large landed eſtate; more eſpecially as he was always frugal, and a great œconomiſt, keeping very exact accounts both of the income of his eſtates, and of what he acquired by his profeſſion; as appears from ſeveral large books, moſtly in his own hand-writing, that are ſtill carefully preſerved, as authentic monuments of his wonderful accuracy and induſtry (10); qualities, by which he was diſtinguiſhed in an age, when they were much more common than they are now. It does not very clearly appear, either when he married this lady, or when ſhe died; but from ſeveral concurring circumſtances it ſeems pretty evident, that his firſt marriage was contracted about ſeven years after he was firſt called to the bar.

[D] Under colour of concealments.] The ſervices rendered by this worthy perſon to the Church of Norwich, were of different ſorts, upon very different motives, and done at many different times. What we aim at in this note, is to give the reader a general, and at the ſame time a clear notion, of the nature of theſe ſervices; becauſe they caſt a ſtrong light upon the temper and diſpoſition of this gentleman, with regard to the Church and Churchmen in general, and of the Clergy of his own county of Norfolk in particular. He was very inſtrumental in procuring an act to paſs in the 35th of Elizabeth (11), when he was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, of the nature cernible, in the freedom with which he beſtowed the many benefices that were in his own gift, and from his memorable ſaying on that head, as indeed many of his ſayings were memorable on very different ſubjects; but in regard to this it was his conſtant maxim, That he would have Church livings paſs by livery and ſeiſin, not bargain and ſale (u). As there was no reign in which great Lawyers were more conſidered than in that of Queen Elizabeth, which perhaps may be one reaſon why in few reigns there have been ſo many conſiderable Lawyers as in her's, ſo, amongſt them, none, towards the latter end of her government, was either more diſtinguiſhed in his profeſſion, or had greater reſpect paid him, than Mr. Coke, whom the Miniſters conſulted in all points of difficulty, and who never failed to furniſh them with legal colours for all their proceedings, which, though many of them were very extraordinary, yet being ſo guarded, were beheld by the people as juſt and honourable. But the affair of greateſt moment, in which, as Attorney-General, he had a ſhare in this reign, was the proſecution of that popular Nobleman Robert Earl of Eſſex, who, together with Henry Earl of Southampton, was brought to the bar before the Lords commiſſioned for his trial in Weſtminſter-Hall, Feb. 19, 1600 (w), the Earl of Buckhurſt ſitting as Lord High-Steward. The charge againſt the Lords was opened by Serjeant Yelverton, in which, though he compared the Earl of Eſſex to Catiline, and expreſſed his wonder that the Lords did not bluſh to put themſelves upon a trial, inſtead of confeſſing their guilt, which he ſaid was in all men's judgment palpable, yet it does not appear that either of the priſoners were troubled at his diſcourſe. But when Mr. Attorney Coke laid open the nature of the treaſon, the many obligations the Earl of Eſſex was under to the Queen, and hinted at laſt, That by the juſt judgment of God, he of his Earldom ſhould be Robert the Laſt, that of a kingdom thought to be Robert the Firſt (x), Eſſex loſt all patience, and on ſeveral other occaſions in his trial, endeavoured to repreſent Mr. Attorney, as having a ſpecial hand in all the proceedings to his prejudice, and as if he was deep in the intereſts of Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh, whom he alledged were his capital enemies; and inſinuated that they, and particularly Sir Robert Cecil, were in the Spaniſh intereſt; and that the latter had gone ſo far as to declare, that none but the Infanta had a right to the crown of England. It does not however appear, that Mr. Attorney Coke had any particular prejudice to that unfortunate Lord, but that, as his manner always was, he kept cloſe to the point; and inſtead of running on, as others did, into parallels from the Greek and Roman Hiſtories, he ſtuck to the facts, and ſhewed wherein the treaſons conſiſted with which the Earls were charged (y) [E]. There is no doubt, that in the latter part of that Queen's ture and effects of which, more will be ſaid hereafter. This was with regard to the Church in general. Some years afterwards, a ſet of people procured, in conſequence of letters-patents of concealment, bearing date Auguſt 2, in the 27th of Queen Elizabeth, ſeveral eſtates to be taken from them by leaſes, and one particularly with the privity of Dr. William Redmayne, then Biſhop of Norwich; but Mr. Attorney Coke foreſeeing what this might produce, interpoſed ſo far as to prevail upon the Biſhop to agree to the bringing in of a bill for eſtabliſhing the Biſhoprick and the revenues, which by his intereſt was paſſed into a law; which ſet the Cathedral of Norwich out of the reach of theſe devourers of Churches, as this gentleman very juſtly calls them (12). This did not hinder the ſame ſort of folks from endeavouring, under the very ſame title, to ſeize the eſtate of the Deanery and Chapter of Norwich; but here again Mr. Attorney Coke interpoſed, and with ſpirit and learning defended the Chapter, and preſerved their eſtates, as the reader may ſee at large in his own excellent work (13). At the cloſe of this report, he ſhews the great importance of the act mentioned at the beginning of this note, and the great ſecurity derived from thence to the Proteſtant Clergy.

'Note reader, The great aſſurance and eſtabliſhment, which is made by the good and ſtrong act of Parliament, of the ſaid moſt illuſtrious and moſt noble Queen Elizabeth, in the ſaid thirty-fifth year of her reign, not only of all foundations of cathedral churches and colleges, in any manner founded or tranſlated, or mentioned to be founded or tranſlated by King Henry VIII. but alſo to all ſubjects who have any eſtate or intereſt, in any of the poſſeſſions of any Abbot, Prior, or any ſuch religious perſons, notwithſtanding they made not any ſurrender to King Henry VIII. or that their ſurrender was inſufficient, or that the record thereof be now imbezzled or loſt; and notwithſtanding divers other ſuch like defects, all which are remedied by the ſaid moſt excellent act of Parliament, the fatal plea to all concealments as to theſe poſſeſſions. And although theſe reſolutions properly concern the meridian of the Cathedral Church of Norwich, yet they will very well ſerve as well for many other Cathedral Churches, as for divers Colleges in the Univerſities of Cambridge and Oxford.'

The Dean and Chapter therefore might well grant, under their common ſeal, an authentic teſtimony of the obligations they were under to ſo kind a friend, ſo learned an advocate, and ſo powerful a protector. This teſtimonial was conceived in the following terms (14).

[E] With which the Earls were charged.] We have a large account of the whole of this tranſaction in Camden, as well as in the printed trial by authority; and in the former, I think there are ſome things more clearly explained than in the latter. We are there told, 'That Southampton made a ſhort and modeſt defence, and aſked pardon for his crime, which was purely owing to his affection for the Earl of Eſſex; and after a declaration of his ſtedfaſt loyalty to the Queen, he anſwered, That ſome propoſals of that kind were made indeed, but nothing reſolved upon, the whole being referred to Eſſex. That what was acted, was a thing quite different from the matter of debate, viz. their going into the city, which was with no other deſign than to facilitate Eſſex's acceſs to the Queen, there to make a perſonal complaint of the wrongs that were done him: that his ſword had not been drawn all that day: that he heard nothing of the Queen's reign, Mr. Attorney was upon the beſt terms poſſible with Sir Robert Cecil, and the reſt of her Miniſters; and there is good reaſon to believe, that the Proclamation of King James, and other papers of State at that time, were drawn by him (z). Yet he was not ſo haſty as many much inferior to him in degree, in procuring admiſſion to the King's perſon; but upon the 22d of May, 1603, when the King feaſted the principal perſons of the kingdom, on account of his quiet acceſſion, at Greenwich, he, together with Robert Lee, then Lord-Mayor of London, and John Crooke, Eſq; the Recorder, received the honour of Knighthood (a). In the beginning of July following, that which was called Sir Walter Raleigh's plot was diſcovered; but though all who were concerned in it were immediately ſeized, and ſent to ſeveral priſons, yet they were not brought to their trial till the beginning of the month of November following, at Wincheſter, to which city the term was adjourned on account of the plague being at London (b). There, upon the 17th of November, Sir Walter Raleigh was tried before commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, amongſt whom were Sir John Popham, Chief Juſtice of England, and Sir Edmund Anderſon, Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas. The trial laſted from morning till ſix in the evening (c): there was no evidence offered againſt the priſoner, but ſeveral examinations of the Lord Cobham, and extracts of other examinations; for the Chief Juſtice told the priſoner, that the ſtatutes requiring two witneſſes were repealed, and that if there were proofs, either under hand, or by teſtimony of witneſſes, or by oaths, it was ſufficient, even if the examinations were not ſigned by thoſe from whom they were taken, if it did otherwiſe appear by evidence that they were taken (d). Sir Edward Coke managed this trial entirely, with much eagerneſs againſt the priſoner, and with great indecency towards the court; for upon Lord Cecil's interpoſing, and deſiring him to be patient, or, as it is elſewhere ſaid, with ſome ſhew of probability, upon that Lord's aſking him, Whether he came thither to direct them (e)? he ſat down in his chair, and would not ſpeak again, until all the commiſſioners joined their entreaties; upon which he roſe up, and recapitulating the circumſtances relating to the charge, Sir Walter was found guilty. This behaviour of Sir Edward Coke has been generally and juſtly cenſured, as carrying in it ſuch marks of heat, reſentment, and an overbearing ſpirit, as much leſſened him in the world's opinion (f). Whatever credit this

He then deſired that the cauſe might be decided by rules of equity, not the niceties and quirks of the law. This the Queen's Attorney called a colourable evaſion, and demanded, Whether it were not treaſon to ſeize upon the Court-Gate, the Court, the Privy-Chambers, &c. hereby to get the Queen into their hands? Southampton calmly aſked him, What he thought, in his conſcience, they deſigned to do with the Queen? The ſame, replied he, that Henry of Lancaſter did with Richard II. He went to the King, and fell on his knees, pretending nothing but the removal of his evil counſellors: but when he had once got the King in his clutches, he robbed him of his crown and life (15).' This ſeems to be a ſevere paſſage, and to have gone deeper in ſhewing the Earl's treaſon, than any in the trial; and yet there are many ſharp things there too, inſomuch that the Earl of Eſſex all along complains of being talked out of his life by Orators; and as for the Earl of Southampton (16), he went farther, making uſe of theſe words at the end of his defence: Mr. Attorney, you have urged the matter very far, and you wrong me therein. My blood be upon your head. Yet it is evident enough, that Mr. Attorney Coke did not ſtretch the nature of that treaſon at all, nor does he ſeem to have changed his opinion ſome years afterwards, as appears by what he ſaid to Sir Walter Raleigh upon this ſubject at his trial: 'Eſſex, ſaid he, died the child of God; God honoured him at his death; thou waſt by when he died: Et lupus & vulpes inſtant morientibus urſæ. He died indeed for his offence (17). The King himſelf ſpake theſe words: He that ſhall ſay Eſſex died not for treaſon, is puniſhable.' So that Coke not only kept his own notions, but prevailed on King James to change his, for we are told, he once conſidered Eſſex as his martyr.

[F] As much leſſened him in the world's opinion.] This appears clearly from a letter ſent to him by Sir Francis Bacon many years afterwards, containing a very extenſive view of all his faults and foibles, wherein are theſe expreſſions (18): 'As in your pleadings you were wont to inſult over miſery, and to inveigh bitterly at the perſons, which bred you many enemies, whoſe poiſon yet ſwelleth, and the effects now appear, &c.' It has been believed, that Shakſpeare, in his comedy of the Twelfth Night (19), hints at this ſtrange behaviour of Sir Edward Coke at Raleigh's trial. Mr. Oſborn ſays plainly, that Sir Walter Raleigh was tired out of his life, by the bawling of the King's Council on one ſide, and the Bench inſiſting on a confeſſion extorted from the Lord Cobham out of fear, on the other. Another gentleman obſerves (20), 'that as to Coke's behaviour, there is but one way to account for it, which is this: that if Eſſex was known to have ever been in any wiſe a friend or patron to him, as it appears he was, in a private memorial of an honourable perſon, who was of the ſame College in Oxford with Raleigh, and almoſt of the ſame ſtanding, then Coke might perhaps think of retrieving himſelf in the eye of the world, and making atonement for his ingratitude to the ſaid Earl alſo, at his trial, and to his memory after his death, by his inhumanity now to one of the contrary faction (21).' The reader may compare this with what is obſerved at the cloſe of the laſt note, from which it plainly appears, that though Sir Edward Coke commended Eſſex's death, yet he did not retract his opinion of his being a traitor, but urges as a confirmation of it, that the King was of his opinion alſo. He was as tenacious of his ſentiment with reſpect to Raleigh's treaſon; for we find him inſiſting upon it again and again, at the trial of the Powder Plotters (22). Yet whatever his opinion might be, it is no ſort of excuſe for his language, and therefore that worthy perſon who wrote the preface to the State Trials, deſcribes very juſtly ſuch petulant Orators in the following terms (23): 'Thoſe who with rude and boiſterous language, abuſe and revile the poor unfortunate priſoner; who ſtick not to take all advantages of him, however hard and unjuſt, which either his ignorance, or the ſtrict rigour of the law may give them; who by force or ſtratagem endeavour to diſable him from making his defence; who brow-beat his witneſſes as ſoon as they appear, though ever ſo willing to declare the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out of countenance, and confound them in delivering their evi-

this great man might lose by his intemperate behaviour upon this occasion, yet he soon recovered it again by the sagacity and vigilance he shewed in unravelling all the dark scenes of the Powder Treason, and by his admirable management of the evidence against Sir Everard Digby, and the rest of the conspirators tried at Westminster, June 27, 1605 (g); and at the trial of Henry Garnet at Guildhall, the 28th of March following; on both which occasions he gave the most convincing proofs of his extensive capacity, quick penetration, and solidity of judgment, so that the Earl of Salisbury had reason to say, in his own speech, upon the last trial, That the evidence had been so well distributed and opened by the Attorney-General, that he never heard such a mass of matter better contracted, or made more intelligible to a Jury (h). This appears so exactly conformable to truth, that many esteem this last speech especially, Sir Edward Coke's master-piece at this day [G]. It was in reward for his service upon this occasion, that it was resolved to promote him to the most beneficial place in the Law; in order to which he was called to the degree of a Serjeant, June 20, 1606 (i); and upon this promotion it was remarkable, that the motto he gave upon his rings came to be afterwards very applicable to his fortune, viz. 'Lex est tutissima cassis,' The Law is the safest helmet (k). On the last of the same month, he was raised to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and as this made way for Sir Henry Hobart to be Attorney-General, so it brought Sir Francis Bacon into the post of Solicitor (l), not much to the satisfaction of the new Chief Justice, if we may confide in a letter written to him by Sir Francis Bacon on that occasion, the contents of which are singular enough [H]. In this post, as Sir Edward Coke behaved

'dence, as if it were the duty of their place to convict all who are brought to trial, right or wrong, 'guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, 'had a peculiar dispensation from the obligations of 'truth and justice. Such methods as these should be 'below men of honour, not to say men of conscience; 'yet in the perusal of this work, such persons will too 'often arise to view; and I could wish for the credit 'of the Law, that that great Oracle of it, the Lord 'Chief Justice Coke, had given less reason to be numbered among this sort.'

[G] Sir Edward Coke's master-piece at this day.] In his speech at the trial of Sir Everard Digby (24), he informs us, that three and twenty days had been spent in taking those examinations, the substance of which he offered to the court: he shews, that the ground-work of this treason was laid in the life-time of Queen Elizabeth; and that two of the conspirators, Catesby and Tresham, had been in all the plots that had fallen under his inspection; that of the unfortunate Earl of Essex, that of Watson and Clark, that with which Sir Walter Raleigh was charged, and now this, which was originally contrived to have taken effect by the assistance of a Spanish army; but not being able to depend upon that, the conspirators had recourse to the horrid design of freeing themselves from penal laws, by blowing up the King, the Royal Family, and the Parliament, with thirty-five barrels of gunpowder. There is not a step or motion of these conspirators, in the management of their affairs, for so many years together, with so many different persons, and in so many several places, that is, in Spain and Flanders as well as in England, but what he has traced out; nor were there any colours in which they meant to shade or conceal their treason, which he did not remove; setting the whole and every circumstance of the transaction in so perspicuous a light, that the prisoners themselves acknowledged, that all their doings were fairly detected, recommending themselves to the favour and intercession of the court. At Garnet's trial (25) he carried his enquiries much higher, and traced the plots and conspiracies of the Priests and Jesuits through the greatest part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, down to this very last; shewing, that there was a constant series of them, from which they were never to be diverted, either by severe laws and frequent punishments, or by repeated acts of lenity and mercy; that with respect to the King then reigning, they plotted against his title to the crown before Queen Elizabeth's death, wrote books on purpose to render it weak and dubious in the opinions of the people; that after his accession, and before his coming into England, they entered into schemes to defeat his possession; as a little more than a month after he came, they formed a design of surprizing his person; that notwithstanding his lenity and clemency towards them in the first year of his reign, they were still prosecuting the same wicked purposes by a variety of treasons; and that by their absolute dominion over the consciences of their deluded followers, they had influenced some who were embarked in this treason, and who died before they could be brought to justice, to perjure themselves in their last moments. To sum up all in a word, whoever desires to see a true picture of the art and subtilty of these sort of men, and to find, in a narrow compass, the history of their endeavours to subvert this constitution, and to throw all things into blood and confusion, for the furtherance of their design, need only peruse this speech of Sir Edward Coke's, most of the capital facts in which, were acknowledged freely by Garnet himself, in open court, after his conviction; so that as the penetration and sagacity of this great man are plainly proved by so long and clear a deduction, the truth of what he delivered is freed from all doubts, by the evidence then produced, and the confession before-mentioned.

[H] The contents of which are singular enough.] As we have occasion to speak often of the disputes and animosities between these two great men Bacon and Coke, it is requisite to produce this short letter from the former to the latter, which shews when, and whence, it took rise, viz. in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Bacon, by the assistance of his great friend the Earl of Essex (26), made the strongest efforts to have obtained the post of Solicitor-General about the year 1594; which missing then, and more than once afterwards, fixed in him that strong desire of mortifying his adversary; for which, as various opportunities offered, so it will be found that he neglected none, whenever they offered. There is no date to this letter; but the contents of it plainly shew, that it was written while Sir Edward Coke continued Attorney-General, and after it was resolved that he should be made Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (27).

'Mr. Attorney,

'I thought best, once for all, to let you know in 'plainness what I find of you, and what you shall 'find of me: you take to yourself a liberty to disgrace and disable my law, my experience, my discretion; what it pleaseth you, I pray think of me; 'I am one that knows both mine own wants and 'other men's, and it may be perchance that mine 'mend, others stand at a stay. And surely I may not 'endure in publick place to be wronged, without 'repelling the same to my best advantage to right 'myself. You are great, and therefore have the 'more enviers, which would be glad to have you 'paid at another's cost. Since the time I missed the 'Solicitor's place (the rather I think by your means) 'I cannot expect that you and I shall ever serve as

haved with great probity as well as ſufficiency, ſo there ſeems to be little or no reaſon to doubt, that he was perfectly well ſatisfied with his ſtation, and would very willingly have remained there as long as he lived: but it ſeems there were other people who deſired to ſee him removed, and the method they took was, by ſuggeſting that his great abilities might be much better employed for the King's ſervice in another place; and by this ſlight he was, October 25, 1613, raiſed to be Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, or, as he ſtyled himſelf, according to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, Chief Juſtice of England (m). By this he made room for Sir Henry Hobart to ſucceed him as Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, whereupon Sir Francis Bacon became Attorney-General; which it is proper to mention, becauſe the latter ſeems to own, that he had no ſmall hand in that intrigue by which all theſe changes were brought about (n); and this plainly ſhews, that the old diſlike between them ſtill continued; and we ſhall meet with ſome other very remarkable inſtances before this article is concluded, that will ſhew how great injuries the public receive from the private feuds and animoſities of great men, who ſtudy to gratify their particular inclinations, though it be at the expence of their Maſter's ſervice, and the good of his ſubjects (o). But notwithſtanding all this, and the Lord Chief Juſtice having, in point of proclamations, prohibitions, and other matters, ſhewn himſelf no friend (p) to a boundleſs prerogative, yet ſo much he retained of the King's favour, or at leaſt ſuch expectations were had of his future ſervices, that November 4, 1613, he was ſworn of the Privy-Council (q). This was a mark only of the King's countenance; for Bacon had now his Majeſty's ear entirely, to whom he repreſented his antagoniſt in a very unfavourable light on many occaſions, but more eſpecially in a certain caſe of treaſon, where he undertook to obtain the opinions of the Judges of the Court of King's-Bench, and particularly that of the Chief Juſtice, ſeparately and privately (r), in which he met with more difficulty than he imagined; for Sir Edward Coke was very unwilling to enter into any matter of this ſort in the manner Mr. Attorney propoſed; becauſe it was directly contrary to his Lordſhip's ſound maxim, That he was a Judge in a Court and not in a chamber. It appears, however, that Sir Francis Bacon valued himſelf very much on the art and ſkill he ſhewed in managing the Chief Juſtice, though in ſpite of all his dexterity and addreſs, he ſeems to confeſs that he was baffled in the end [I]. In the ſpring of the ſucceeding year, an occaſion happened,

' Attorney and Solicitor together; but either to ſerve ' with another upon your remove, or to ſtep into ' ſome other courſe: ſo as I am more free than ever ' I was, from any occaſion of unworthy conforming ' myſelf to you, more than general good manners, or ' your particular good uſage ſhall provoke; and if ' you had not been ſhort-ſighted in your own for- ' tune (as I think), you might have had more uſe of ' me. But that ſide is paſſed. I write not this, to ' ſhew my friends what a brave letter I have written ' to Mr. Attorney; I have none of thoſe humours, but ' that I have written is to a good end; that is, to ' the more decent carriage of my Maſter's ſervice, ' and to our particular better underſtanding one of ' another. This letter, if it ſhall be anſwered by you ' in deed and not in word, I ſuppoſe it will not be ' worſe for us both: elſe it is but a few lines loſt; ' which for a much ſmaller matter I would have ad- ' ventured. So this being to yourſelf, I for my ' part reſt.'

[I] That he was baffled in the end.] It is neceſſary, in the firſt place, to ſhew what the nature of this buſineſs was; next, what the King deſired; and, laſtly, how Sir Francis Bacon endeavoured to accompliſh what the King committed to his charge. As to the firſt, the caſe was this: Mr. Peacham was a Miniſter, and in a ſermon found in his ſtudy, which was never preached, or intended to be publiſhed, there were ſeveral paſſages ſuppoſed to be treaſonable (28). Now the thing the King deſired, was to have the ſentiments of the Judges as to theſe paſſages ſeparately and privately, before the man was brought to his trial. This was the point Sir Francis Bacon was to manage, and of his management he gives this account to the King, in a letter dated January 27, 1614 (29).

' For the courſe your Majeſty directeth and com- ' mandeth, for the feeling of the Judges of the King's- ' Bench their ſeveral opinions, by diſtributing our- ' ſelves and enjoining ſecrecy; we did firſt find an ' encounter in the opinion of my Lord Coke, who ' ſeemed to affirm, that ſuch particular, and as he ' called it, auricular taking of opinions, was not ac- ' cording to the cuſtom of this realm; and ſeemed to ' divine, that his brethren would never do it. But ' when I replied, that it was our duty to purſue your ' Majeſty's directions, and it were not amiſs for his ' Lordſhip to leave his brethren to their own anſwers; ' it was ſo concluded, and his Lordſhip did deſire ' that I mought confer with himſelf; and Mr. Ser- ' jeant Mountague was named to ſpeak with Juſtice ' Crook, Mr. Serjeant Crew with Juſtice Houghton, ' and Mr. Solicitor with Juſtice Dodderidge. This ' done, I took my fellows aſide, and adviſed that they ' ſhould preſently ſpeak with the three Judges, be- ' fore I could ſpeak with my Lord Coke for doubt of ' infuſion; and that they ſhould not in any caſe make ' any doubt to the Judges, as if they miſtruſted they ' would not deliver any opinion apart, but ſpeak re- ' ſolutely to them, and only make their coming to ' be, to know what time they would appoint to be ' attended with the papers. This ſorted not amiſs; ' for Mr. Solicitor came to me this evening, and re- ' lated to me, that he had found Judge Dodderidge ' very ready to give opinion in ſecret; and fell upon ' the ſame reaſon, which upon your Majeſty's firſt ' letter I had uſed to my Lord Coke at the Council- ' Table; which was, that every Judge was bound ' expreſsly by his oath, to give your Majeſty council ' when he was called; and whether he ſhould do it ' jointly or ſeverally, that reſted in your Majeſty's ' good pleaſure, as you would require it. And ' though the ordinary courſe was to aſſemble them, ' yet their mought intervene caſes wherein the other ' courſe was more convenient. The like anſwer ' made Juſtice Crook; Juſtice Houghton, who is a ' ſoft man, ſeemed deſirous firſt to confer; alledging, ' that the other three Judges had all ſerved the crown ' before they were Judges, but that he had not been ' much acquainted with buſineſs of this nature. We ' purpoſe therefore forthwith, they ſhall be made ac- ' quainted with the papers; and if that could be ' done as ſuddenly as this was, I ſhould make ſmall ' doubt of their opinions: and howſoever I hope, ' force of law and precedent, will bind them to the ' truth: neither am I wholly out of hope, that my ' Lord Coke himſelf, when I have in ſome dark man- ' ner put him in doubt that he ſhall be left alone, ' will not continue ſingular.'

In

happened by which the Chief Juſtice might have recovered his Maſter's favour. Mr. Oliver St. John, upon a benevolence being ſet on foot, had declared his opinion publicly, that it was againſt law, reaſon, and religion, for which he was brought into the Star-Chamber; and April 25, 1615, was ſentenced there to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds, and to ſuffer impriſonment during the King's pleaſure (s). Upon this occaſion, as Bacon told the King in a letter, the Chief Juſtice delivered the law for the benevolence ſtrongly; but adds, that this might do him no good, that he wiſhed he had done it timely (t). Another caſe followed ſoon after, in which Bacon alſo boaſts of having ſifted the Chief Juſtice, but owns that he found him exceedingly clear in his opinion; and this too was a caſe of treaſon: for one Mr. Owen, of Godſtowe, in Oxfordſhire, having aſſerted that Princes excommunicated by the Pope might be lawfully killed, he was thereupon indicted and convicted, May 17, 1615 (u). Some time after this there broke out a very extraordinary affair, which was the diſcovery of Sir Thomas Overbury's being murdered in the Tower, at the diſtance of about two years after the fact happened; for Overbury died September 16, 1613 (w), and the judicial proceedings againſt his murtherers did not commence till about September 1615. It has been much diſputed whence this affair took riſe, ſome aſcribing it to Dr. George Abbot, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was ſuppoſed to have a great averſion to the Earl of Somerſet; others to Sir Edward Coke (x); but the moſt probable opinion is, that Sir Ralph Winwood, who ſucceeded the Earl of Somerſet as Secretary, had the firſt intelligence of it from one Mr. Trumbal, the King's Agent in the Low-Countries, which produced ſome ſtrong reports that reflected on Sir Gervaſe Ellways, Lieutenant of the Tower; and he, by endeavouring to vindicate his own character, brought the whole matter to light, as has been already mentioned in another place (y). In the detecting all the ſecret ſteps of this dark buſineſs, the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke was equally zealous and diligent, taking, as we are told from a very high authority, ſeveral hundred examinations (z). In conſequence of theſe, the principal actors in this black affair were apprehended and brought to juſtice, notwithſtanding all the arts and influence that were exerted to prevent it. Richard Weſton, who had been Overbury's Keeper, was brought to his trial October 19, 1615, at Guildhall, and at firſt ſhewed a reſolution of ſtanding mute; to which he is ſaid to have been prompted by the King's Solicitor, who owed his promotion, and other favours, to the Earl of Somerſet (a). The Chief Juſtice very judiciouſly avoided coming to extremities by adjourning the Court, and before it met again Weſton was prevailed upon to plead, and was thereupon convicted and executed (b). Upon this, Sir John Hollis, afterwards Earl of Clare, Sir John Wentworth, and Mr. Lumſden, undertook to examine him at the gallows, in order to make the world believe, that this exemplary act of juſtice, was only the effect of a conſpiracy againſt that Nobleman, who has been ſo often mentioned, for which they were ſeverely cenſured in the Star-Chamber (c). It is certain, that from the very beginning, the Chief Juſtice was very apprehenſive of the conſequences of this affair, and therefore went to Royſton to the King, and deſired that others might be joined with him in commiſſion, which was granted; and theſe commiſſioners were, the Lord Chancellor Elleſmere, the Duke of Lenox, Lord Steward, and the Lord Zouch, Warden of the Cinque Ports; and by their aſſiſtance this whole buſineſs was conducted (d). Sir Francis Bacon, in a letter to the King himſelf, ſays, that this was the wiſeſt action of Sir Edward's life; which ſeems to ſpeak it to have been voluntary, and ſo it is repreſented upon another ſolemn occaſion (e). But there is, notwithſtanding, a very different account of this matter, which, as it is ſuppoſed to have come from the mouth of one of his Lordſhip's ſons, who was an eye and ear witneſs, may be worth the reader's notice (f) [K]. But however this matter

In another letter, dated the 31ſt of the ſame month, he acquaints the King at large, with the arguments he made uſe of to the Lord Chief Juſtice; and concludes with ſaying, that the Chief Juſtice deſired the papers might be left with him (30); and notwithſtanding, it appears by ſeveral letters, that Sir Francis Bacon gave him no reſt, yet it was a fortnight before he could obtain his Lordſhip's anſwers; which were ſo little to his purpoſe, that he tells the King his Maſter, He was glad to ſend them in the Chief Juſtice's hand-writing, for his own diſcharge (31). [K] May be worth the reader's notice.] There is hardly any tranſaction, about which there has been more written, than as to this barbarous and inhuman murder of Sir Thomas Overbury; and yet it may be very truly affirmed, that hardly any of the relations we have, are (at leaſt as they ſtand) of any great authority; becauſe moſt of them are full of inconſiſtencies, contradictions, and palpable falſhoods; notwithſtanding which, we find them tranſcribed into our hiſtories, as if they contained indiſputable facts. The following is a very proper ſpecimen of this, as it pretends to great accuracy, as well as to the beſt authority (32). 'The King, ſays this writer, at this 'time, that is, when the murder was diſcovered, 'which he places in the middle of Auguſt, was at 'Royſton, and Somerſet with him; and when the King 'had been there about a week, next day he deſigned 'to proceed to Newmarket, and Somerſet to return to 'London, when Sir Ralph (Winwood) came to Royſton; 'and acquainted the King with what he had diſco-'vered about Sir Thomas Overbury's murder: the 'King was ſo ſurprized herewith, that he poſted away 'a meſſenger to Sir Edward Coke, to apprehend the 'Earl: I ſpeak this with confidence, becauſe I had 'it from one of Sir Edward's ſons.

'Sir Edward lay then at the Temple, and meaſured 'out his time at regular hours, two whereof were to 'go to bed at nine o'clock, and in the morning to 'riſe at three. At this time Sir Edward's ſon, and matter might be, the Chief Juſtice, with the aſſiſtance of his fellow-commiſſioners, proceeded vigorouſly, though with great caution. On the 7th of November following, Mrs. Anne Turner, who had been about the Counteſs of Somerſet from her youth, was brought to her trial in the Court of King's-Bench, and upon very full evidence convicted and executed (g). On the 16th of the ſame month, Sir Gervaſe Ellways, who had been Lieutenant of the Tower, was convicted at Guildhall, and on the 20th hanged at Tower-Hill (h). Upon the 27th of the ſame month, James Franklin was tried and convicted in the King's-Bench, and a few days after executed. One would have imagined, after all this, that no great blame could be laid at the Chief Juſtice's door; and yet we find a certain writer charging him, though in all appearance very falſely, with dealing hardly with the priſoner at this laſt trial, and making too much haſte in the former (i) [L]. Sir Thomas Monſon, who was a great favourite with Lord Northampton, who

'ſome others, were in Sir Edward's lodging, but 'not in bed, when the meſſenger, about one in the 'morning, knocked at the door, where the ſon met 'him, and knew him: Says he, I come from the King, 'and muſt immediately ſpeak with your father. If you 'come from ten Kings, he anſwered, you ſhall not, for I 'know my father's diſpoſition to be ſuch, that if he be 'diſturbed in his ſleep, he will not be fit for any buſi-'neſs; but if you will do as we do, you ſhall be wel-'come; and about two hours hence my father will riſe, 'and you then may do as you pleaſe; to which he aſ-'ſented.

'At three Sir Edward rung a little bell, to give 'notice to his ſervant to come to him, and then the 'meſſenger went to him and gave him the King's let-'ter, and Sir Edward immediately made a warrant 'to apprehend Somerſet, and ſent to the King that he 'would wait upon him that day.

'The meſſenger went back poſt to Royſton, and ar-'rived there about ten in the morning; the King had 'a loathſome way of lolling his arms about his fa-'vourites necks, and kiſſing them; and in this poſture 'the meſſenger found the King with Somerſet, ſaying, 'When ſhall I ſee thee again? Somerſet then deſigning 'for London, when he was arreſted by Sir Edward's 'warrant: Somerſet exclaimed, that never ſuch an 'affront was offered to a Peer of England, in the pre-'ſence of the King: Nay man, ſaid the King, if 'Coke ſends for me I muſt go; and when he was gone, 'Now the Deel go with thee, ſaid the King, for I will 'never ſee thy face any more.

'About three in the afternoon, the Chief Juſtice 'came to Royſton, and ſo ſoon as he had ſeen the 'King, the King told him that he was acquainted 'with the moſt wicked murder by Somerſet and his 'wife, that was ever perpetrated, upon Sir Thomas 'Overbury; and that they had made him a pimp, to 'carry on their bawdry and murder; and therefore 'commanded the Chief Juſtice, with all the ſcrutiny 'poſſible, to ſearch into the bottom of the conſpiracy, 'and to ſpare no man, how great ſoever; concluding, 'God's curſe be upon you and your's, if you ſpare any of 'them; and God's curſe be upon me and mine, if I par-'don any one of them.'

In the firſt place it is obſervable, that here is not one ſingle date; but from the manner in which this is delivered, one would imagine that all theſe facts paſſed in the month of Auguſt: but there is another circumſtance which ſeems to point out the day, and that is the commitment of the Earl of Somerſet; and yet this was upon the 18th of October (33). It is indeed true, as is ſaid in the text, that Sir Edward went to Royſton, and received the King's inſtructions, and this might be about the time, or perhaps before the Earl of Somerſet was committed. It is certainly not true, that he was ſent for from Royſton, or arreſted there by Sir Edward Coke's warrant. On the contrary, he was at full liberty when Weſton was firſt taken up and examined, and came from court to London, to outface the report that he was concerned in the murder (34). It is no leſs certain, that at this very time King James was not convinced of the Earl of Somerſet's having a hand in the murder: but upon the application of the Lord Chief Juſtice, which ſeems to have been on the day the Earl was committed, and that was the day before Weſton was arraigned, the enquiry was referred to commiſſioners mentioned in the text (35), and not to the Judges: ſo that, upon the whole, there are very few circumſtances in all this account, that can, with any ſhadow of probability, be thought true; and this will ſtill farther appear, from the circumſtances mentioned in the ſubſequent notes.

[L] Dealing hardly with the priſoner at this laſt trial, and making too much haſte in the former.] Sir Anthony Welden, if he was the author of the book that goes under his name, pretends alſo to tell this ſtory very circumſtantially; ſometimes from his own knowledge, and ſometimes from the information of perſons, who had the greateſt opportunity of knowing the truth. His account is equally inconſiſtent with itſelf, and with the former, and yet moſt of the ſame facts are in it. He makes the King go from Whitehall to Royſton; and the ſame day, when he was there, ſend for all the Judges, and make a ſpeech to them, ending with the curſes mentioned in the former (36). The Chief Juſtice's ſon, if the account laſt mentioned came from him, makes the King ſend only for his father late at night (37). Sir Anthony Welden makes the Judges ſent for to Royſton in a body (38), without ſhewing any cauſe why the King did not ſend for them the day before, when he was at Whitehall. Yet Sir Francis Bacon, in a letter to the King himſelf, ſays, that Sir Edward Coke went of his own accord, and ſhews us why he went (39). Sir Anthony Welden pretends to have been an eye-witneſs of the King's parting with Somerſet, and ſpeaks of his hanging upon his neck, and kiſſing him (40). The former account ſays, this was after the Chief Juſtice had ſent for him, and that by a warrant (41); Sir Anthony directly the contrary, and that he was not arreſted till his coming to London, which the King knew would happen, but Somerſet did not (42). Wilſon, from whom we have the ſame ſtory, ſays, that the Chief Juſtice ſent for him, and that the Earl complained to the King of his inſolence (43). After all it is certain, that he was not ſent for, that he came to London of his own motive, and to take meaſures for his own ſafety, as he affirmed himſelf (44) at his trial. But Sir Anthony Welden, though he makes the Earl of Somerſet as black as he can make him, inclines to make this a conſpiracy againſt him, into which he inſinuates Sir Edward Coke entered, on account of Sir George Villiers's brother being to marry his daughter, which was a thing not thought of for many years after. Having thus prejudiced the reader's opinion againſt the Chief Juſtice, he proceeds to blacken his conduct in the following manner (45). 'And now 'poor Mrs. Turner and Franklyn began the trage-'dy; Mrs. Turner's day of mourning, being better 'than the day of her birth; for ſhe died very peni-'tently, and ſhewed much modeſty in her laſt act, 'which is to be hoped was accepted with God: after 'that died Weſton, and then was Franklyn arraigned, 'who confeſſed that Overbury was ſmothered to death, 'not poiſoned to death, though he had poiſon given 'him. Here was Coke glad how to caſt about to 'bring both ends together, Mrs. Turner and Weſton 'being already hanged for killing Overbury with 'poiſon: but he being the very quinteſſence of the 'law, preſently informs the Jury, that if a man be 'done to death with piſtols, poinards, ſwords, 'halters, poiſon, &c. ſo he be done to death the in-'dictment is good, if but indicted for any of thoſe 'ways: but the good Lawyers of thoſe times were 'not of that opinion, but did believe that Mrs. 'Turner who appears to have been very deep in this affair, and to have made uſe of him as his agent, was arraigned on the 4th of December at Guildhall, as an acceſſary, before the fact, with Weſton and the reſt, in poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury (k): yet he was never tried, for reaſons about which poſterity have been but darkly informed; and it is with much confidence reported, that the Lord Chief Juſtice, at his arraignment, let fall ſome very haſty and myſterious ſpeeches, which gave occaſion to the ſtopping the progreſs of his proſecution (l). Yet with reſpect to theſe ſpeeches, there is only inconſiſtent and ſuſpicious evidence, as the reader will ſee in the notes [M]. One might conjecture, from the laying together of circumſtances, that Sir Thomas Monſon's trial

'Turner was directly murthered by my Lord Coke's 'law, as Overbury was without any law.' Some little truth there is in this paragraph, and but a little, for Weſton was executed long before Mrs. Turner; and not only hanged before her, but before ſhe was arraigned. As for Sir Thomas Overbury's being ſmothered, that is a pure invention of his own; nor was Franklyn ever indicted for any ſuch thing, but for procuring the poiſons which Weſton adminiſtered to Sir Thomas; neither was Franklyn preſent at Overbury's death, nor was there ever the leaſt ſuſpicion but by himſelf, that Mrs. Turner was murdered by my Lord Coke's law. In all probability, this poor gentleman wrote after his ſenſes began to fail him: for, after all, there was a kind of ground for this ſtrange ſtory that he has told, though not with regard to Franklyn, but to Weſton; of whom, as we ſaid before, there was a report that he did not confeſs the fact at his death; and the reaſon of this the Lord Chief Juſtice gave, in the ſpeech he made at the trial of Sir John Hollis in the Star-Chamber, from a dark remembrance, or a hearſay report, of which this wild tale was coined. What he ſaid, take in his own words (46). 'In this caſe of Weſton, he would ne-'ver confeſs the indictment, becauſe the indictment 'was, that he poiſoned Sir Thomas Overbury with 'arſenick, roſeaker, and mercury ſublimate, when as 'indeed it was not known what poiſon killed him. 'Here the poor man conceived a ſcruple, that if he 'did not know with which of the poiſons Overbury 'was poiſoned, he was not guilty of the offence laid 'in the indictment, and therefore ſaid he was not 'guilty of the offence. Now, ut obſtruatur os iniqui, 'that the mouth of the wicked man may be fully 'ſtopped, after that it was reſolved unto him, that 'the manner of killing laid in the indictment, was 'not the point of the indictment, but the matter of 'killing; as if the indictment be that a man was 'killed with a ſword, whereas indeed he was killed 'with a dagger, yet the party is guilty, becauſe the 'killing of a man is the point of the indictment: 'then he confeſſed the fact.'

(46) State Trials, vol. i. p. 337.

[M] As the reader will ſee in the notes.] The firſt, and indeed the moſt credible author that relates any thing upon this head to the prejudice of the Chief Juſtice, delivers his ſtory thus (47). 'Sir Thomas 'Monſon, another of the Counteſs's agents in this 'poiſoning contrivance, had paſſed one day's trial at 'Guildhall. But the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, in 'his rhetorical flouriſhes at his arraignment, vented 'ſome expreſſions (which he either deduced from 'Northampton's aſſuring the Lieutenant of the 'Tower, that the making away of Sir Thomas Over-'bury would be acceptable to the King, or from ſome 'other ſecret hint received) as if he could diſcover 'more than the death of a private perſon; intimat-'ing, though not plainly, that Overbury's untimely 'remove had ſomething in it of retaliation, as if he 'had been guilty of the ſame crime againſt Prince 'Henry, bleſſing himſelf with admiration at the hor-'ror of ſuch actions. In which he flew ſo high a 'pitch, that he was taken down by a court lure; Sir 'Thomas Monſon's trial laid aſide, and he ſoon after 'ſet at liberty, and the Lord Chief Juſtice's wings 'were clipt for it ever after.

(47) Wilſon's Life and Reign of King James, p. 702.

'And it was rumoured that the King (heightened 'to ſo much paſſion by this eruption of Sir Edward 'Coke's) went to the Council-Table, and kneeling 'down there, deſired God to lay a curſe upon him and 'his poſterity for ever, if he were conſenting to Over-'bury's death.' It is exceedingly ſtrange, that if the Lord Chief Juſtice really dropt any ſuch expreſſions at this trial, there ſhould not be a word of them mentioned in the minutes of that trial, which were publiſhed not only at a time when any thing might have been freely ſaid in reſpect to this Monarch's memory, but when, from the preface prefixed to them, it plainly appears the great end of publiſhing them, was to throw dirt upon him (48). It is alſo worth obſerving, that the ſtory of the curſe is entirely altered for the third time, but appears here with greater probability than in either of the other ſtories. Here comes in properly, what Sir Anthony Welden ſays, both with reſpect to the King's curſe, and the Chief Juſtice's ſpeech (49). 'It is verily believed, that when 'the King made thoſe terrible imprecations on him-'ſelf, and deprecations of the Judges, it was in-'tended the law ſhould run in its proper channel, 'but was ſtopt and put out of courſe, by the folly of 'that great Clerk, Sir Edward Coke, though no 'wiſe man; who in a vain-glorious ſpeech, to ſhew 'his vigilancy, enters into a rapture as he ſat on the 'bench, ſaying, God knows what became of that ſweet 'babe Prince Henry, but I know ſomewhat; and ſure-'ly, in ſearching the cabinets, he lighted on ſome 'papers that ſpake plain in that, which was ever 'whiſpered; which had he gone on in a gentle way, 'would have fallen in of themſelves, not to have been 'prevented; but this folly of his tongue, ſtopt the 'breath of that diſcovery, of that ſo foul a murder, 'which I fear cries ſtill for vengeance.' There is yet another writer who ſpeaks of this matter, and it is very fit the reader ſhould ſee what he ſays (50): 'There was a general rumour, that the Chief Juſtice, 'making a ſevere inſpection into Overbury's murder, 'found ſome papers about the poiſoning of Prince 'Henry; and Sir Anthony Welden, in his Hiſtory 'of the Reign of King James, ſays, That the Chief 'Juſtice had blabbed abroad ſo much: I am ſure there 'was never any ſuch acquaintance between the Chief 'Juſtice and him, that he ſhould blab it out to Wel-'den: whether this was true or falſe I cannot tell, 'but ſure the diſplacing Sir Edward Coke the next 'year, gave reputation to theſe rumours?' Yet this very writer, notwithſtanding this inſinuation, very well knew what was the real cauſe of Sir Edward Coke's removal, and that from his family, which he afterwards gives in his work very fairly (51). What has been before ſaid of the printed trials, is a full anſwer to both theſe writers, as well as to him who is firſt cited. But beſides all this, we have ſeveral letters of Sir Francis Bacon's to the King upon this ſubject, in which he is far enough from magnifying the Chief Juſtice's conduct, and yet not a word in them of theſe intemperate ſpeeches (52). If it ſhould be ſuggeſted, that Bacon could not mention theſe to his Maſter with decency, we have yet another letter of his to Sir Edward Coke after his fall, in which he inſiſts largely upon his errors in the management of this buſineſs; and there ſurely he would hardly have omitted a thing, at once ſo groſs and ſo notorious, if there had been any truth in it (53). On the whole, therefore, this ſeems to be a groundleſs rumour thrown out by thoſe, who hated both the King and the Chief Juſtice; and who were credulous enough to believe any thing, or at leaſt malicious enough to ſay any thing, that might fix an odium upon either. As to the credulity of Sir Anthony Welden, it appears clearly in this, that after all he has ſaid, he declares, in his own opinion, that the Earl of Somerſet was innocent of the murder (54); and, which is ſtill more extraordinary, he ſeems to think Sir Gervaſe Ellways innocent (55) alſo; ſo that his notions and his evidence, ſeem to be of equal value; or, to ſpeak plainly, of no value at all.

was poſtponed, in order to bring on thoſe of the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet: for if the evidence had failed in convicting him, it might have given a new turn to things, at leaſt with reſpect to the Earl; and his conviction was now looked upon as a point of very great conſequence (m). Beſides, Sir Francis Bacon was now come into the principal management of things, who had not meddled in this matter before, but left the proſecution of the other offenders to the Queen's Attorney-General. For this reaſon we find the proceedings were now drawn into a greater length; and it is pretty evident, that in the courſe of them certain circumſtances appeared, by which a ſuſpicion was given, that beſides their privity to this murder, Northampton and Somerſet had been embarked in ſome ſtate intrigues of a dark and dangerous conſequence, and had been tampering with the Spaniards (n). Hence aroſe the neceſſity of new ſearches and freſh examinations, by which this matter received a delay of ſome months. In the mean time, there happened another affair that produced no ſmall diſturbance to the Chief Juſtice. This was a claſhing in point of juriſdiction, between the Court in which his Lordſhip ſat as Chief, and the High Court of Chancery (o). This made a very great noiſe then, and has been the ground of much controverſy ſince, notwithſtanding the matter was brought to ſome kind of termination a few months after (p). At this time, when the difference broke out, the Chief Juſtice was of ſo great uſe, that thoſe who were none of his friends, adviſed the King to diſſemble any knowledge he had of the ſhare he took in it; and what ſhare that was, or rather was ſuppoſed to be, will at the bottom of the page appear (q) [N]. By this means things were kept quiet a little, while matters were preparing for the trials of the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet, in which thoſe who were now entruſted with the King's ſecrets, were obliged to carry fair with him. Yet, as a variety of accidents retarded theſe trials, the enemies of the Chief Juſtice contrived to bring him into a new difficulty in reſpect to the buſineſs of Commendams, where he behaved with great dignity and firmneſs, and in which, if he was guilty of any error, he [N] Will at the bottom of the page appear.] The cleareſt, moſt curious, and withal moſt conciſe account of this affair, is contained in a letter from Sir Francis Bacon, then Attorney-General, to King James; and as he profeſſes therein, to write ex officio, for the true information of his Maſter's judgment, ſo it is very apparent, that he penned it with equal ſkill and ſincerity; and conſidered in that light, it is one of the fineſt papers that ever fell from his pen (56).

(56) Bacon's works, vol. iv. p. 611.

'It is neceſſary I let your Majeſty know, the ground 'of the difference between the two courts, that your 'Majeſty may the better underſtand the narrative.

'There was a ſtatute made 27 Edw. III. cap. 1. 'which, no doubt, in the principal intention thereof, 'was ordained againſt thoſe that ſued to Rome; 'wherein there are words ſomewhat general againſt 'any that queſtioneth, or impeacheth any judgment 'given in the King's courts, or in any other courts. 'Upon theſe doubtful words (other courts) the con'troverſy groweth. For the ſounder interpretation 'taketh them to be meant of thoſe courts, which 'though locally they were not held at Rome, or 'where the Pope's chair was, but here within the 'realm, yet in their juriſdiction had their dependance 'upon the court of Rome; as were the court of the 'Legate here, and the courts of the Archbiſhops and 'Biſhops, which were then but ſubordinate judgment'ſeats to that high tribunal of Rome. And for this 'conſtruction, the oppoſition of the words, if they be 'well obſerved, between the King's courts and other 'courts, maketh very much, for it importeth as if 'thoſe other courts were not the King's courts. Alſo 'the main ſcope of the ſtatute fortifieth the ſame. 'And laſtly, the practice of many ages. The other 'interpretation which cleaveth to the letter, ex'poundeth the King's courts to be courts of law 'only, and other courts to be courts of equity, as 'the Chancery, Exchequer-Chamber, Duchy, &c. 'Though this alſo flieth indeed from the letter, for 'that all theſe are the King's courts.

'There is alſo another ſtatute, which is but a ſim'ple prohibition, and not with a penalty, of a pre'munire, (as the other is) that after judgments given 'in the King's courts, the parties ſhall be in peace, 'except the judgment be undone by error or attaint, 'which is a legal form or reverſal. And of this alſo 'I hold the ſounder interpretation to be, to ſettle poſ'ſeſſions againſt diſturbances, and not to take away 'remedy in equity, where thoſe judgments are ob'tained ex rigore juris, and againſt good conſcience.

'But upon theſe two ſtatutes, there hath been a late 'conceit in ſome, that if a judgment paſs at the com'mon law againſt any, that he may not after ſue for 'relief in Chancery; and if he doth, both he and his 'Counſel, and his Solicitors, yea and the Judge in 'Equity himſelf, are within the danger of thoſe 'ſtatutes.

'Here your Majeſty hath the true ſtate of the queſ'tion, which I was neceſſarily to open to you, firſt 'becauſe your Majeſty calleth for this relation, not 'as news, but as buſineſs. Now to the hiſtorical 'part.

'It is the courſe of the King's-Bench, that they 'give in charge to a Grand Jury offences of all na'tures, to be preſented within Middleſex where the 'ſaid court is; and the manner is to enumerate them, 'as it were in articles. This was done by Juſtice 'Crook the Wedneſday before the term ended. And 'that article (if any man after a judgment given had 'drawn the ſaid judgment to a new examination in any 'other court) was by him ſpecially given in charge, 'which had not uſed to be given in charge before. It 'is true it was not ſolemnly dwelt upon, but as it 'were thrown in amongſt the reſt.

'The laſt day of the term, and that which all men 'condemn, the ſuppoſed laſt day of my Lord Chan'cellor's life, there were two indictments preferred 'of premunire, for ſuing in Chancery after judgment 'in common law; the one by Richard Granville, the 'other by William Allen; the former againſt Court'ney, the party in Chancery, Gibb the Chancellor, 'and Deurſt the Clerk; the latter againſt Alderman 'Bowles and Humphrey Smith, parties in Chancery; 'Serjeant More, the Counſellor, Elias Wood, Soli'citor in the cauſe, and Sir John Tindal, Maſter in 'Chancery, and an Aſſeſſor to my Lord Chancellor.

'For the caſes themſelves it were too long to trou'ble your Majeſty with them, but this I will ſay, if 'they were ſet on that preferred them, they were the 'worſt markſmen that ever were, that ſet them on. 'For there could not have ben choſen two ſuch cauſes 'to the honour and advantage of the Chancery, for 'the juſtneſs of the decrees, and the foulneſs and ſcan'dal both of fact and perſon, in thoſe that impeach 'the decrees.

'The Grand Jury, conſiſting, as it ſeemeth, of 'very ſubſtantial and intelligent perſons, would not 'find the bills, notwithſtanding they were clamoured 'by the parties, and twice ſent back by the court; 'and, in concluſion, reſolutely ſeventeen of nine'teen found an ignoramus, wherein, for that time, I 'think, Ignoramus was wiſer than thoſe that knew 'too much.'

offended

offended in company with all his brethren, as will be ſhewn hereafter (r). This happened towards the latter end of April, and within a day or two after the Peers were ſummoned for the trial of the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet. The latter was firſt tried on the 24th of May, and Lord Chancellor Elleſmere ſat as Lord High Steward. The King's inſtructions were produced to the commiſſioners, by which they were directed to examine, firſt, Whether there were good grounds to believe the Lord and Lady guilty? and if there were not, then they were to enquire after the authors of the conſpiracy (s). To theſe inſtructions were ſubjoined heads of examination, and they were produced to the Lords as an evidence of the King's care and impartiality, as well as the commiſſioners diligence in this buſineſs. The Counteſs gave them no trouble, for ſhe pleaded guilty (t). The next day, being the 25th of May, the Earl of Somerſet was tried, and the Lord Chief Juſtice gave a very full and fair account of his own conduct in the whole buſineſs, and the manner in which the letters and other written evidence produced came into the hands of the commiſſioners; ſo that after a trial, which laſted twelve hours, the Earl was found guilty by his Peers (u). All the thanks which the Chief Juſtice received for his honeſt zeal and matchleſs vigilance in this buſineſs, was to be conſidered in a bad light at Court, where he was alike perſecuted by the friends of the old, and the creatures of the new, favourite. By the induſtry of theſe people, his conduct was not only miſrepreſented to the King, but to the crowd; and Bacon, who certainly wrote as well as any man, undertook to make my Lord Coke himſelf ſenſible (w), that for all the pains and labour he had beſtowed, he met with no worſe treatment than he deſerved [O]. It was not long after, that he was attacked in another manner, and with greater [O] He met with no worſe treatment than he deſerved.] It is very certain, that this letter of Sir Francis Bacon, as it is written with much ſpirit and freedom, ſo it is very far from being void of elegance or truth; and perhaps it had been a great happineſs for him, if, in his turn, he had met with ſuch a monitor. It is however to be regretted, that this letter has no date, though the very circumſtances of it plainly ſhew, that Sir Edward was already under difficulties, though not abſolutely overthrown; and hence we may conjecture, that it might be penned in June 1616. At preſent, we will quote only what relates to theſe proſecutions (57).

(57) Ibid. p. 612, 613.

'In your laſt, which might have been your beſt 'piece of ſervice to the ſtate, you affected to follow 'that old rule, which giveth juſtice leaden heels and 'iron hands; you uſed too many delays, till the de'linquents hands were looſed, and your's bound: in 'that work you ſeemed another Fabius, where the 'humour of Marcellus would have done better. 'What need you have ſought more evidences than 'enough? While you pretended the finding out of 'more (miſſing your aim) you diſcredited what you 'had found. This beſt judgments think; though 'you never uſed ſuch ſpeeches as are fathered upon 'you, yet you might well have done it, and but 'rightly: for this crime was ſecond to none but the 'Powder Plot: that would have blown up all at one 'blow, a merciful cruelty; this would have done the 'ſame by degrees, a lingering but a ſure way; one 'by one might have been culled out, till all oppoſers 'had been removed.

'Beſides, that other plot was ſcandalous to Rome, 'making Popery odious in the ſight of the whole 'world; this hath been ſcandalous to the whole Goſ'pel, and ſince the firſt nullity to this inſtant, when 'juſtice hath her hands bound, the Devil could not 'have invented a more miſchievous practice to our 'State and Church than this hath been, is, and is like 'to be. God avert the evil!

'But herein you committed another fault; that as 'you were too open in your proceedings, and ſo 'taught them whereby to defend themſelves; ſo you 'gave them time to undermine juſtice, and to work 'upon all advantages, both of affections, and ho'nour, and opportunity, and breach of friendſhip; 'which they have ſo well followed, ſparing neither 'pains nor coſts, that it almoſt ſeemeth an higher 'offence in you to have done ſo much indeed, than 'that you have done no more; you ſtopt the confeſ'ſions and accuſations of ſome, who perhaps had 'they been ſuffered, would have ſpoken enough to 'have removed ſome ſtumbling-blocks out of your 'way; and you did not this in favour of any one, 'but of I know not what preſent unadviſed humours, 'ſuppoſing enough behind to diſcover all, which fell not out ſo. Howſoever, as the Apoſtle ſaith in 'another caſe, you went not rightly to the truth, and 'therefore though you were to be commended for 'what you did, yet you were to be reprehended for 'many circumſtances in the doing; and doubtleſs 'God hath an eye in this croſs to your negligence, 'and the briars are left to be pricks in your ſides, 'and thorns in your eyes.'

It is not a little ſtrange, that theſe reflections upon Sir Edward Coke's conduct have gone ſo long current, and are like to be tranſmitted without ſo much as a remark to poſterity, and yet ſurely they deſerve a contrary uſage. The Lord Chief Juſtice, at his ſetting out, acted with the ſpirit of Marcellus; which nobody knew better than the author of this letter, or he would not have ſaid ſo much in his fine ſpeech againſt Sir John Hollis in the Star-Chamber (58). But when there appeared ſuch a ſpirit in the city and country, as well as in the court, of treating this matter not as a courſe of juſtice, but as a conſpiracy againſt the Earl of Somerſet, it very much imported Sir Edward Coke to act with caution. It was then he aſſumed the character of Fabius; and this very writer told the King thereupon, in one of his letters, it was the wiſeſt part he ever acted (59): but what was right then, could it be wrong now? As to the trial of the great offenders, no man could be better acquainted with the reaſons of the delay than the author of this letter, who aſcribes them abſolutely to the Chief Juſtice, though ſurely many of them lay out of his power. For firſt they could not be tried as acceſſaries before the fact, till the principals were convicted. Franklyn, who was the laſt of them, was tried on the 30th of November, and on the 9th of December following, the Counteſs of Somerſet was brought to bed (60). This was another cauſe of delay, which the Chief Juſtice could not either foreſee or prevent. But the Earl might have been tried in the mean time. He might ſo, if there had been evidence to convict him, which very probably there was not; ſince the evidence on which he was convicted, did not come to the Chief Juſtice's hands till the 21ſt of December, when by accident the trunk was diſcovered, in which the letters that affected him were hid (61). There was indeed a delay of four months after this; but that ought not to lie at the Chief Juſtice's door, as any who will peruſe this gentleman's letters to Sir George Villiers and the King will perceive. Others have accuſed Sir Edward Coke for his intemperate ſpeeches, of which he is acquitted by Sir Francis Bacon; who by a very ſingular kind of logick, cenſures him for not uſing them, though himſelf adviſed and procured the King's command, that no harſh ſpeeches ſhould be uſed at the trials of the Earl and Counteſs (62). After all, what was done in the way of juſtice was done by Lord Coke; what was afterwards done in greater effect; first, with relation to the cause of Commendams, in which not only his behaviour, but that of the whole twelve Judges, was examined and censured in the Privy-Council, for doing what they took to be their duty, and following what they understood to be the meaning of an Act of Parliament; to which the rest submitted patiently, but Sir Edward Coke expostulated the matter with dignity and decency; so that notwithstanding he could not resist a superior power, for here he had both the Crown and the Church, or rather the Crown at the instigation of the Church, against him; yet he did not give way to it, or afford any sanction to the usage he met with, by a tame and pusillanimous submission (x) [P]. About this time the business of the Court of in the way of mercy, came through other hands. It is also no less certain, as the reader may see in another place, that Bacon was very jealous of Coke's becoming Chancellor; to prevent which, he insinuated some things to the King, that were not much to the advantage of Lawyers, or indeed of the Law itself (63). These are facts that occur in justification of this great man's memory, though I do not find they have ever been applied to that purpose. The reader must decide with what propriety they have been so applied here.

[P] By a tame and pusillanimous submission.] The history of this affair, which is very curious, and has also a very close connection with the memoirs of this eminent person, we shall digest into the narrowest compass possible. The dispute arose thus: Dr. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, informed the King, that Serjeant Chiborne, in arguing the cause against Commendams at the Common Pleas Bar, had maintained divers positions contrary to the King's prerogative, as that the translation of Bishops was against the Canon Law; and that the King had no power to grant Commendams but in cases of necessity; which necessity could never happen, because no man was bound to hospitality beyond his means (64). Upon this information, the King directed his Attorney-General, Sir Francis Bacon, to signify his pleasure unto the Lord Chief Justice, that he held it necessary himself should be first consulted, before the Judges proceeded to argue it; and therefore the day appointed should be put off, till they might speak with his Majesty. This letter was dated April 25, 1616 (65). Sir Edward Coke, upon receiving the letter, desired the other Judges might have the like, which they accordingly had; and upon their meeting together, they came unanimously to a resolution of doing in this case, what they took to be their duty; and when they had so done, they justified themselves by the following letter to the King. Mr. Collier, in his Ecclesiastical History, says, this letter was signed by ten Judges, of whom Coke and Hobart were two (66); but the reader will see (67), that it was signed by all the twelve, and runs thus:

'Most dread and most gracious Sovereign,

'IT may please your most excellent Majesty to be 'advertised, That this letter here inclosed, was de- 'livered unto me your Chief Justice on Thursday last 'in the afternoon, by a servant of your Majesty's 'Attorney-General; and letters of like effect were 'on the day following, sent from him by his servant 'to us, your Majesty's Justices of every of the Courts 'at Westminster: we are, and ever will be ready, 'with all faithful and true hearts, according to our 'bounden duties, to serve and obey your Majesty, and 'think ourselves most happy to spend our times and 'abilities to do your Majesty true and faithful service. 'In this present case mentioned in this letter; what 'information hath been made unto you, whereupon 'Mr. Attorney doth ground his letter from the 'report of the Bishop of Winton, we know not; this 'we know, that the true substance of the cause, 'summarily is thus: It consisteth principally upon 'the construction of two Acts of Parliament, the one 'of the 25th year of King Edward III. and the other 'of the 25th of King Henry VIII. whereof your 'Majesty's Judges upon their oaths, and according 'to their best knowledge and learning, are bound to 'deliver their true understanding faithfully and up- 'rightly; and the case between two for private inte- 'rest and inheritance, earnestly called on for justice 'and expedition. We hold it our duty to inform 'your Majesty, that our oath is in these express 'words, That in case any letters come unto us con- 'trary to Law, that we do nothing by such letters, 'but certify your Majesty thereof, and go forth to do 'the Law notwithstanding the same letters: we have 'advisedly considered of the said letter of Mr. Attor- 'ney, and with one consent do hold the same to be 'contrary to Law, and such as we could not yield to 'by our oath; assuredly persuading ourselves, that 'your Majesty being truly informed that it standeth 'not with your royal and just pleasure to give way to 'them. And therefore knowing your Majesty's zeal 'to justice to be most renowned, therefore we have 'according to our oaths and duties, at the very day 'prefixed the last term, proceeded, and therefore 'certified your Majesty, and shall ever pray to the 'Almighty for your Majesty in all honour, health, 'and happiness, long to reign over us.

The King replied in a letter, that the alledging their oath for their non-compliance, was a weak and impertinent pretence: that it was very unreasonable to suppose his predecessors should be carried off their guard to such a degree, as to pass an act so very prejudicial to their prerogative: that their oath only reached to private cases between subject and subject, and was designed to prevent the Prince being solicited by either of the parties. And in the close, commands them not to proceed in the cause, till his return to London. At his Majesty's coming to town, the Judges were all sent for to the Council-Table. The King began with taking their letter in pieces, and shewing their misbehaviour with respect both to matter and manner. He reprimands them for their remissness, in permitting the Council to dispute his prerogative at the Bar; and tells them it was their duty to check those intemperate sallies, and not suffer such insolence upon the Crown. Then as to their own business he acquaints them, That deferring their resolution upon just and necessary reasons, is neither a denial nor delay of justice: 'tis rather a pause of necessary prudence: nothing being more proper and advisable, than to consult the King where the Crown is concerned. He told them farther, That to say the point was a private contest between the subject, was wide of the case: for that a Bishop, the defendant, pleaded for a Commendam only in virtue of the prerogative royal: and besides, they could not prove either of the parties solicited for expedition. And lastly, he let them know their letter was indecently couched, and failed in the form. Upon this all the Judges kneeled, owned their error, and craved pardon. But as to the matter, the Chief Justice Coke stood upon his defence, declared that his Majesty's command for stopping the proceedings was a delay of justice, and by consequence against Law and their oath: and that as they intended to manage the pleading, the King's prerogative should not have been concerned. To this the King answered, that for them to pronounce whether his prerogative was concerned or not, without consulting him, was preposterous management. And his Majesty required the Lord Chancellor to deliver of Chancery was alſo brought to an iſſue, in which it is generally thought, that the Chief Juſtice, who was a man of high ſpirit, and naturally prone to rough meaſures, was, in reality, much in the wrong (y). But perhaps there is ſomewhat of miſtake in this matter; for though it ſhould be granted that there might be ſomething amiſs in the deciſion of the cauſe in the King's-Bench, which gave occaſion to this diſpute, and that conſequently it was reaſonable the party injured ſhould find relief elſewhere; yet as it was never ſuggeſted that the Chief Juſtice did any thing that was wrong, and as there appear only ſuſpicions of his having countenanced the meaſure taken to ſupport the juriſdiction of his Court, we ought not to be too haſty in concluding to his prejudice (z) [Q]. But a deſign there was of humbling him, and a multitude of great and powerful perſons were embarked in it; ſo that there is no great cauſe for amazement, if, notwithſtanding his ſteady courage, his great integrity, and his quick and admirable parts, he was brought into great difficulties, more eſpecially in the Royal preſence, and before a new judicature, and where thoſe who ſat while he knelt, were, ſome of them at leaſt, the principal authors of his calamity, and the inventors of this new method of treating a Lord Chief Juſtice, conſidered by the nation as the head of the Law, in a manner as extraordinary as it was mortifying (a) [R]. The iſſue of this ſtrange buſineſs, that on liver his opinion, whether he had commanded the Judges any thing againſt Law and their oath?

The Chancellor excuſing himſelf as to the point of Law, referred the Queſtion to the King's Counſel. Upon this the Attorney-General Bacon declared, That to put off the day was no delay of juſtice, nor any failure in their oaths: that the King's reaſons for this delay were only to ſecure his prerogative: and therefore puts the queſtion to the Judges, Whether this refuſal of theirs to make a ſtay, was not nearer a breach of their oath? For they were ſworn to counſel the King when they are called. But not to give his Majeſty counſel till the buſineſs is over, is in effect not to give counſel at all. The reſt of the King's Counſel concurred with the Attorney. The Chief Juſtice Coke argued the King's Counſel had exceeded their bounds: that it was their duty to plead before the Judges, but not againſt them. To this the Attorney Bacon replied, that the King's Counſel were obliged both by their oath and office, not only to plead, proceed, and declare againſt the greateſt ſubject, but alſo againſt any body of ſubjects, were they Judges, Courts, or Commons in Parliament: That the Judges had highly outraged their character by making this challenge. And in the cloſe, the Attorney appealing to the King, the Chief Juſtice ſaid he would not diſpute it with his Majeſty. The Lord Chancellor gave his opinion for the King, and his Counſel learned in the Law. Upon this the queſtion was put by all the Lords of the Board, Whether in a caſe where the King believed his prerogative or intereſt concerned, and requires the Judges to attend him for their advice; whether in ſuch a caſe they ought not to ſtay proceedings till his Majeſty has conſulted them?

All the Judges ſubmitted to the affirmative ſide of the queſtion, excepting Coke Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, who ſaid, That when the caſe happened, he would do his duty. The Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas was more compliant in his anſwer, and declared that for his part, he would always truſt the juſtice of the King's command. The day drawing nigh for arguing the Commendams farther, the King aſked the Judges if they intended to diſcuſs, whether the King had a general power for granting Commendams or not? They agreed not to draw his Majeſty's power into queſtion, and promiſed to correct the preſumption of thoſe pleaders, who took the liberty to ſtate the prerogative. And as to the preſent caſe, Judge Dodderidge gave his opinion for the King, that the Church was void and in his Majeſty's gift; and that he might grant a Commendam to a Biſhop, before, or after conſecration, and that either during life, or for years. When the Judges were gone, it was reſolved by the Privy-Council, that what the King required, was neither againſt Law, nor the Judge's oath. And this opinion was ſigned by all the Board (68).

(68) Franklyn's Annals of King James, p. 17, from the Council Book.

[Q] We ought not to be too haſty in concluding to his prejudice.] We are told by a certain Hiſtorian, that the caſe in the King's Bench about which all this trouble aroſe, was a very foul one; and ſo indeed it was, if he hath ſtated it fairly (69); which from certain authorities I have ſeen, I really conceive he has. The matter then was thus: the defendant in the cauſe while in the King's Bench, prevailed upon the plaintiff's principal witneſs not to attend, or to give any evidence in the cauſe, provided he could be excuſed. One of the defendant's agents undertakes this, and carrying the witneſs to a tavern, called for a gallon of ſack in a pot, and bid the man drink. As ſoon as he laid his lips to the flaggon, the defendant's agent quitted the room. When the witneſs was called, the Court was informed that he was unable to come; to prove which this agent was produced, who depoſed, that he left him in ſuch a condition, that if he continued in it but a quarter of an hour he was a dead man. For want of this perſon's teſtimony the cauſe was loſt, and the verdict given for the defendant. Upon this a bill was brought in Chancery for relief, to which the defendants refuſed to anſwer, and were committed for their contempt; and they again in revenge for this, preferred bills at the cloſe of term, as has been before mentioned. The King having all this matter brought before him, and having had it ſolemnly argued by his Attorney and Solicitor-General, and Counſel learned in the Law, cauſed the ſame to be ſettled by an order of Council (70). In this matter it cannot be denied, that the reſort of the plaintiffs to the Court of Chancery was very reaſonable; but then on the other hand, there is room to imagine, that ſome inconveniencies were alſo diſcernable in the other practice, ſince we fined that Sir Francis Bacon (71), upon his having the Seals, thought fit amongſt other things to declare himſelf largely upon this very head in the court of Chancery, and this in terms, which ſhew plainly enough, that how much ſoever he aggravated the offence of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke, in taking ſuch rough meaſures to ſupport the juriſdiction of his Court; yet he did not care in the place he then held, to be eſteemed the author of a ſentiment directly oppoſite, but choſe rather to qualify the power of the Court of Chancery, and thereby remove effectually thoſe inconveniencies, that with great reaſon were apprehended, from the claſhing of theſe juriſdictions. Whoever deſires to ſee this whole matter, as it was diſcuſſed upon this memorable occaſion, may conſult the book cited in the margin, and receive full ſatisfaction (72). It may not be amiſs however to obſerve, that it will hereafter appear, that the Lord Chief Juſtice himſelf was content with this deciſion, and that he never complained of it afterwards; which is a proof, that the principal point he aimed at, was to obtain ſome kind of ſettlement, that was to be an univerſal benefit to the ſubjects of this kingdom; and for the ſake of which, his conduct might ſurely be excuſed, though not juſtified.

(b) Camden. Annal. Jac. I. p. 19.

'he was by your commandment to charge him for certain acts and ſpeeches, wherein your Majeſty was much unſatisfied, which were in number three. I. An act done. II. Speeches of high contempt, uttered in the ſeat of juſtice. III. Uncomely and undutiful carriage in the preſence of your Majeſty, the Privy-Council, and Judges. Concerning the firſt, which was the act, it was done when he was in a place of truſt, and concealed a ſtatute of 12,000*l.* taken of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton to the uſe of Sir Edward Coke, when he was your Majeſty's Attorney-General, not to pay a debt of good value due unto your Majeſty, nor to accept of a diſcharge for the ſame. And for the better ſtrengthening of the ſtatute, there was likewiſe a bond taken of 6000*l.* with ſureties to the ſame effect. So that Sir Chriſtopher Hatton lay charged under the penalty of 18,000*l.* not to pay the debt, nor agree to any ſurrender, diſcharge, or releaſe, nor any ways to aſſent thereunto. That this offence was aggravated by the denial and proteſtation made of late by the Lord Chief Juſtice, that he was not privy to the condition of the defeazance, whereas the ſtatute was taken to himſelf by indenture, whereof Sir Chriſtopher Hatton's part was found, but the other was not found. That he was privy to the penning of it, inſerted words with his own hands, and that Mr. Walter and Mr. Bridgman his own Counſel, were witneſſes thereunto. The ſecond, words ſpoken in the King's Bench the laſt day of Hilary Term laſt, at a caſe of Glanvill and Allen, whereof the Solicitor made a narrative relation, and charged the Lord Chief Juſtice to have given too much heart and encouragement to that cauſe; and that he had too conſtantly directed the Jury, turning them thrice from the Bar, that if they ſet their hand to a bill after judgment, he would foreclose them the Court. And further in another cauſe the ſame day, ſaid, that the Common Law of England would be overthrown, and that the light of the Law would be obſcured. And that all this was confirmed by good witneſſes. The third and laſt point, was his undecent behaviour before your Majeſty, your Council, and your Judges. And that conſiſted of two points. Firſt, the exception that he took at your learned Counſel in your preſence, for ſpeaking at your commandment. The ſecond, that your Majeſty having opened yourſelf in the caſe of Commendams, and ſatisfied the Judges that your Majeſty's ſending to them, had no intent to delay juſtice; and the queſtion being put to the reſt of the Judges, whether they did not hold it for a delay of juſtice, that your Majeſty had ſent in the caſe, or if your Majeſty ſhould ſend hereafter in a like caſe, wherein your Majeſty's progenitors were intereſted? The reſt of the Judges ſubmitting themſelves, he only diſſented from all the reſt. This being the effect of your Solicitor's charge, your Lord Chief Juſtice made anſwer, that he would by their Lordſhips favour begin with the laſt. And ſaid, for the part of challenge and taking exception at your Majeſty's Counſel learned, ſpeaking in the caſe by your Majeſty's commandment, he acknowledged it for an error, and ſubmitted himſelf. To the part, that upon the queſtion aſked the Judges, touching ſtay of proceedings, he denied when all the reſt did yield, his anſwer was, That the queſtion yielded many particulars, which ſuddenly occurred to his mind, and cauſed him to make his anſwer; that when the time ſhould be, he would do that which ſhould become an honeſt and juſt Judge. For the bond he ſaith, that that aſſurance was in hammering a year and a half, they were Elephanti libelli; and now twelve years being paſt, it was no great marvel if his memory were ſhort. Eſpecially ſince about that time he was employed, firſt, in the great ſervice of the Prieſt treaſon and Cobham, and in the next year in the Powder Treaſon. And that if any things had ſlipped in the multitude of buſineſs, that theſe ſervices blot out his errors. Secondly, ab impoſſibili, which was, that the debt remaining at the time, was 33,000*l.* and that young Mr. Hatton's means were very mean, and not above 100 marks a year. And as ſoon as it came to the poſſibility, when he firſt heard of Sir Robert Rich's offer, he then ſubmitted it before ſuch time as he remembered the ſtatute or defeazance. Thirdly, Cui bono? He ſaid he had never any profit by it, but the preſentation to a benefice, and all the reſt was his wife's. Fourthly, that the Crown was content with the eſtabliſhment, and he did but take bond to continue it. And throughout all this, he did ſubmit himſelf to your Majeſty and the Board, ſaying, Actus not facit reum, niſi mens ſit rea. For his ſpeech in the King's Bench, &c. he ſaith, that firſt, whatſoever was done, was by the common conſent. And for thoſe ſpeeches, many of them were ſpoken, and he knew by whom they were ſpoken, but not by himſelf. And then offered four conſiderations. I. That the Court, unto which nevertheleſs he did except, was ad informandum non ad convincendum. II. They were witneſſes but on one ſide. III. That the interrogatories might be drawn too ſhort. IV. That it was concerning words ſpoken four months ago, which being ſpoken amongſt many, may be diverſly reported. And thereupon produced a paper written by himſelf, containing, as he ſaith, the true paſſage of the day (which paper we preſent unto your Majeſty here withal) being, as he ſaith, ſet down by himſelf the day after, ſedato animo. And touching theſe words, that the Common Law would be overthrown, and the Judges would have but little to do at the Aſſizes, becauſe the light of the Law would be obſcured, he confeſſeth the words, but ſaith, they were not ſpoken the ſame day, but at another time, in a caſe of Sir Anthony Mildmay's. And added, that he would not maintain a difference between the two Courts, nor bring it into queſtion; yet if it were an error, he may ſay, Erravimus cum patribus. And thereupon alledged the examples. Firſt, the article againſt Cardinal Wolſey, 20 Hen. VIII. wherein the ſame words are uſed, viz. that ſuch proceedings in the Chancery, tended to the ſubverſion of the Common Law, art. 20. Secondly, the book intituled the Doctor and Student. Thirdly, an opinion of the Judges in Throgmorton's caſe, in Queen Elizabeth's time. And added alſo further, that for the time to come, no man ſhould ever make any oppoſition. So that the Judges having received your Majeſty's commandment by the Attorney-General, that no bill of that nature ſhould be hereafter received, he and his brethren have cauſed the ſame to be entered as an order in the ſame Court, which ſhall be obſerved; which being the effect of his anſwer, we have thought to add withal, that before us, as well in ſpeech as in action, he behaved himſelf modeſtly and ſubmiſſively.'

On the 30th of June following, the Chief Juſtice preſented himſelf again at the Council Table (74) upon his knees, when Secretary Winwood informed him, that report had been made to his Majeſty of what had paſſed there on the Wedneſday before, together with the anſwer he had given, and that too in the moſt favourable manner, but that his Majeſty was no way ſatisfied in reſpect to any of the heads; but that notwithſtanding his Majeſty, as well out of his own clemency, as in regard to the former ſervices of his Lordſhip, was pleaſed not to deal heavily with him, and therefore had decreed, I. That he be ſequeſtered from the Council Table, until his Majeſty's pleaſure be further known. II. That he forbear to ride his ſummer-circuit as Juſtice of Aſſize. III. That during this vacation, while he had time to live privately and diſpoſe himſelf at home, he take into his conſideration and review his books of Reports; wherein as his Majeſty is informed, be many extravagant and exorbitant opinions ſet down and publiſhed, for poſitive and good Law. And if in reviewing and reading thereof, he find any thing fit to be altered and amended, the correction is left to his diſcretion.

(74) From a MS. Collection belonging formerly to Dr. Moore, late Biſhop of Ely, and now to the Univerſity of Cambridge, by the gift of his late Majeſty George I.

ſtood thus till the 15th of November, when Sir Henry Mountague was made Chief Juſtice; and at the time of his being ſworn into his office, it was intimated, that the cauſe of his predeceſſor's removal was his too great popularity (c). We are, however, to conſider this merely as a colour; ſince it is in a manner certain, that he loſt his office for not complying with the will of the favourite, then Lord Viſcount Villiers (d), afterwards Duke of Buckingham; and as this aſſertion would be an inexcuſable injury to King James's adminiſtration, if it were not well founded, ſo it will be ſhewn in the notes, that it is not a piece of ſecret hiſtory drawn from the libels of thoſe times, or from weak and ſuſpected authorities, but ſupported by plain, poſitive, and inconteſtable evidence (e) [S]. Thus was this great man removed from that high ſeat of juſtice, in which he had been regarded as the Oracle of the Law; and be it ſpoken to his honour, that he was removed by the power of his enemies, and did not fall through any fault of his own. Not that Sir Edward Coke was free from imperfections, either as a man or as a Judge; but thoſe imperfections were not of a nature to require, or to juſtify, ſuch a proceeding towards him; and this is apparent from hence, that he might have been reſtored if he would but have taken, not the right, but the ready, road to it; which he diſdained: for his anſwer upon ſuch a motion was (f), That as a Judge ought not to take, ſo neither ought he to give, a bribe. We are told that his Maſter ſaid of him, That which ever way he was thrown, he would fall upon his feet: but perhaps it might be cretion. Amongſt other things, the King was not well pleaſed with the title of thoſe books, wherein he ſtyled himſelf Lord Chief Juſtice of England, whereas he could challenge no more, but Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench. And having corrected, what in his diſcretion he found meet, in theſe Reports, his Majeſty's pleaſure was, he ſhould bring the ſame privately to himſelf, that he might conſider thereof, as in his princely judgment ſhould be found expedient. Hereupon Mr. Secretary adviſed him to conform himſelf in all duty and obedience, as he ought, whereby he might hope that his Majeſty, in time, would receive him again to his gracious and princely favour. Thereunto the Lord Chief Juſtice made anſwer, That he did in all humility proſtrate himſelf to his Majeſty's good pleaſure; that he acknowledged that decree to be juſt, and proceeded rather from his Majeſty's exceeding mercy, than from his juſtice; gave humble thanks to their Lordſhips for their favours and goodneſs towards him; and hoped that his behaviour, for the future time, ſhall be ſuch as ſhould deſerve their Lordſhips favours. The Lords having thus far proceeded, the Lord-Treaſurer told him, that he had one thing more to let him know, which belonged to the Earl Marſhal to take notice of, which was, that his coachman uſed to ride bare-headed before him, which was more than any ways he could aſſume or challenge to himſelf, and required him to forbear it for the future. To which the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, That his coachman did it only for his own eaſe, and not by his commandment. And ſo, with the like ſubmiſſion and acknowledgment of favour, departed.

[S] But ſupported by plain, poſitive, and inconteſtable evidence.] A certain writer, who ſays that he had his information from one of his Lordſhip's ſons, gives us the hiſtory of his removal, pretty truly in the main (75); though he makes a ſtrange miſtake in the name, and lets ſlip a very material paſſage, if indeed his author, out of regard to his father's memory, did not conceal it from him. We will relate the whole ſtory, let the blame fall where it will. In the time of the Earl of Somerſet's proſperity, Sir Edward Coke had given his conſent to an agreement, that upon Sir John Roper's reſigning the office of Chief Clerk for inrolling of Pleas in the King's-Bench, which, at that time, was worth four thouſand pounds a year, he would admit two perſons that ſhould hold that office in truſt for the favourite (76). Upon the fall of the Earl of Somerſet, and the riſe of Sir George Villiers, an overture was made to the Chief Juſtice by Sir Francis Bacon, that he ſhould admit two truſtees for the new favourite (77). To this the Chief Juſtice gave no other anſwer, than that he was old and could not ſtruggle, which very probably was taken for a mark of compliance. But when Sir John Roper actually ſurrendered his office, in conſideration of which, July 9, 1616, he was created Lord Teynham (78), the Chief Juſtice ſhewed himſelf of another opinion; and ſuggeſted, that as the ſalary of the Judges in his Court were very ſmall, it would be an eaſy matter to augment them, by making a proper uſe of this place, which was abſolutely in his diſpoſal (79). This was Sir Edward's great crime; for a reſolution was immediately taken to remove him, and to prefer another perſon, who ſhould do what the favourite, now Lord Viſcount Villiers, expected. It ſeems that Lord Teynham was deſirous of having one of the lives, and leaving the other to the Viſcount; and to this the Lord-Treaſurer Suffolk was inclined to give way; but the Attorney-General interpoſed warmly, and ſecured both lives for his friend. He went farther ſtill, for he took declarations in truſt from Mr. Shute and Mr. Heath, afterwards Solicitor-General, who were to be the Viſcount's deputies and truſtees, ſo as to ſecure him the entire benefit of that office for their lives, that he might diſpoſe of it by will, in caſe he died before them (80). His caution ſtretched beyond this; for Sir Henry Mountague, then Recorder of London, being the perſon fixed upon to ſucceed Sir Edward Coke, he took a tye of him, (not a toy, as it is falſly printed in Bacon's works) that is, an obligation that he would keep his promiſe (81); for having miſtaken one Chief Juſtice's ſenſe, he was reſolved not to truſt another. Accordingly, he was no ſooner poſſeſſed of his office, than Lord Villiers's deputies were admitted. All theſe circumſtances are collected, as the reader ſees, from Bacon's own letters; and if it be requiſite to ſhew, that this was the true and abſolute reaſon of Sir Edward Coke's removal, we have their teſtimony for that too; for thus Sir Francis Bacon writes to the Viſcount (82). 'I did caſt with 'myſelf, ſays he, that if your Lordſhip's deputies had 'come in by Sir Edward Coke, who was tied, (that 'is, under an agreement with Somerſet) it would 'have been ſubject to ſome clamour from Somerſet; 'and ſome queſtion what was forfeited by Somerſet's 'attainder, being but a felony to the King; but now 'they coming in from a new Chief Juſtice, all is 'without queſtion or ſcruple.' Thus the reader ſees plainly, what was meant by the ſeveral gradations of Sir Edward Coke's puniſhment, and why he was ſuſpended before he was removed; as well as the means made uſe of to intereſt the new favourite in both. It is a very ſtrange thing, and deſerved to be ſet in a clear light, that the great may ſee there is a time, when the darkeſt intrigues are diſcovered, and the cloſeſt and moſt ſubtile practices are brought to light. The miſtake committed by the author firſt mentioned, is this: he ſets down Sir Nicholas Tufton inſtead of Sir John Roper; and ſays, he was created Earl of Thanet, inſtead of Lord Teynham, which was the natural conſequence of his firſt miſtake: his omiſſion is, that he takes no notice of Sir Edward's Coke's agreement with the Earl of Somerſet, from whence the new demand aroſe; and as it is probable he had his account from Sir Robert Coke, it is not at all unlikely that he might conceal that circumſtance, out of tenderneſs to his father's memory.

more truly ſaid, that in ſpite of all the art and power of his adverſaries, he ſtill ſtood upon them (g), and made good his motto, when advanced to the degree of a Serjeant, The Law is the beſt helmet: for it was not long before a new turn happened in his affairs, and that ſome even of thoſe who were moſt buſy in bringing him into difficulties, found it for their intereſt, and therefore were as ready to bring him out of them again; and to ſmooth the way for his return to ſome degree, at leaſt, of the King his Maſter's favour. But the firſt ſtep to his being reſtored to credit, was a difference that fell out between the Lord-Keeper Bacon, and Secretary Winwood: for upon the King's going to Scotland, about the middle of March, 1617, the chief direction of affairs was confided to the former, who carrying it ſomewhat haughtily to the Secretary, he is ſaid to have refuſed ever to ſit afterwards with him in council, during the King's ſervice (b). Sir Edward Coke having buſineſs with Secretary Winwood, who was his old friend, and knowing his intereſt with the favourite, now become Earl of Buckingham, propoſed to him a match between the Earl's elder brother Sir John Villiers, and his own youngeſt daughter by the Lady Hatton (i). An account of this being written to Buckingham in Scotland, the propoſal was readily accepted; but it very quickly appeared, that notwithſtandingthe great perſonages intereſted therein, it was not likely to proceed ſo quietly as might have been expected; and, in proceſs of time, this little family buſineſs ripened into an affair of State (k). On the one hand, the Lady Hatton reſenting her huſband's attempt to diſpoſe of her daughter without aſking her leave, carried away the young lady, and lodged her at Sir Edmund Withipole's houſe, near Oatlands (l). Upon this Sir Edward wrote immediately to the Earl of Buckingham, to procure a warrant from the Privy-Council, to reſtore his daughter to him; but before he received an anſwer, he had intelligence where ſhe was, and thereupon, without waiting for any authority, he went with his ſons to Sir Edmund Withipole's houſe, and took her away by force, which produced a complaint of the Lady Hatton to the Privy-Council (m). On the other hand, the Lord-Keeper Bacon, ſuſpecting that he ſhould loſe the favourite, and in conſequence of that the King, oppoſed this match to the utmoſt, and thereby drew upon himſelf immediately that, of which he had only a diſtant apprehenſion. For Buckingham, who was not of a nature to bear any contradiction, reſented his proceeding highly; and his mother, the Lady Compton, loſt all patience, and treated the Lord-Keeper with extraordinary freedom (n). His Lordſhip, however, was ſo ſet upon carrying this point, that he countenanced the Attorney-General, Sir Henry Yelverton, (the ſame perſon who had adviſed Weſton to ſtand mute at his trial) in filing an information in the Star-Chamber againſt Sir Edward Coke, for the ſteps he had taken to recover his daughter (o). In the mean time the two Ladies, Compton and Hatton, came to a good underſtanding; and ſoon after the latter was, in appearance at leaſt, reconciled to Sir Edward Coke, upon which the Star-Chamber ſuit was ſuſpended. On the King's return from Scotland, which was on the 15th of September, Sir Edward Coke was reſtored to his favour, and reinſtated in his place (p) as a Privy-Counſellor, for which however he paid pretty dearly [T]. The King's affairs, in general, were at this time in much diſorder on every ſide,

[T] For which however he paid pretty dearly.] To ſuch a degree was King James under the direction and dominion of his favourite, that upon his coming to London, he ſignified his ſatisfaction in their conduct to ſuch of his Miniſters as had promoted this match, and made thoſe who had oppoſed it thoroughly ſenſible of his diſpleaſure, particularly Bacon and Yelverton. The former, by a very deep ſubmiſſion to Buckingham, ſoon recovered the King's good graces (83); but the latter ſtood upon his integrity, and never made any ſubmiſſions, which coſt him afterwards the loſs of a great part of his fortune, and a ſevere impriſonment; and yet his courage and conſtant friendſhip to his old maſter Somerſet, wrought ſo much with Buckingham, that he ſued for his friendſhip, and made him a Judge of the Common-Pleas unaſked, in which ſtation he died (84). The very ſame day the King arrived, Sir Edward Coke was admitted to his preſence, and to the Council-Table; and on Michaelmas-day following, Sir John Villiers was married to Mrs. Frances Coke, at Hampton-Court, with all the ſplendor imaginable (85). It was this wedding, that as it reſtored Sir Edward to credit at court, went ſo deep in his fortune. For beſides 10,000*l.* paid in money at two payments, Sir Edward, and his ſon Sir Robert, did, upon the 2d of November, purſuant to articles and directions from the Lords of the Council, aſſure to Sir John Villiers a rent charge of 2000 marks per annum, during Sir Edward's life; and of 900*l.* a year during the Lady Hatton's, if ſhe ſurvived her huſband. And after both their deaths, the manor of Stoke, &c. in Buckinghamſhire, of the value of 900 l. per annum, (being the moiety of the lands intended to his two daughters by the Lady Hatton) to Sir John Villiers and his Lady, and to the heirs of her body. And that the ſame were ſettled, by good conveyances carefully drawn, upon the 27th of January, 1617, was certified to his Majeſty, under the hands of Sir Ranulph Crewe, Sir Robert Hicham, and Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Serjeants and Attorney (86). It is not abſolutely certain, what ſettlements were made by the Lady Hatton upon this marriage, but without queſtion they were very conſiderable; for ſince her marriage with Sir Edward Coke, ſhe had purchaſed the iſland and caſtle of Purbeck, and ſeveral other eſtates in different counties; and by her liberality upon this occaſion, ſhe procured her liberty ſoon after; for at the time of the marriage ſhe was confined, upon the complaint of her huſband (87). On the 2d of November ſhe was ſet at large, and on the 18th of the ſame month, ſhe entertained (88) the King, the Duke of Buckingham, and the whole court, without inviting her huſband. In the month of June, 1619, Sir John Villiers was raiſed to the dignity of Baron Stoke, in the county of Buckingham, and Viſcount Purbeck, in the county of Dorſet (89); and it was currently reported, that the Lady Hatton might have been raiſed to the dignity of Viſcounteſs Weſtmoreland at the ſame time, but that ſhe refuſed to come up to the price (90). All this time the quarrel between her and her huſband ſubſiſted, and many letters are ſide, but more eſpecially in reſpect to his treaſure, which, through his own liberality on one ſide, and the frauds of thoſe who had been entruſted with the management of it on the other, was, in a great meaſure, exhauſted; and, which was ſtill worſe, it was found a thing equally difficult, to procure ſupplies, or to work a reformation (q). The favourite was by no means inclined to a Parliament, the only method by which the firſt could be obtained; and therefore the latter was looked upon as the only remedy, in reſpect to which the counſels of Sir Edward Coke were very much regarded. The Lord-Chancellor Bacon, ſeeing him in this road, and aiming, as he apprehended, at the poſt of Lord-Treaſurer, dropped his animoſity; and from this time forward we find Sir Edward Coke's abilities repreſented in a very favourable light, both to Buckingham and the King his maſter (r). It would draw this article into too great a length, if we ſhould enter particularly into the ſervices he performed of this kind during his continuance in favour, and therefore it ſhall ſuffice to give the reader a ſuccinct account of them in the note [U]. The enemies of this great man have repreſented him as one of an impatient ſpirit, and yet apt to retain the impreſſion of injuries, and to follow them, at a great diſtance of time, with extraordinary reſentments (s). If this was really a part of his character, he had undoubtedly as many favourable opportunities, during the ſhort ſpace in which he enjoyed this ſecond poſſeſſion of power, from the recovery of his Maſter's favour, as ever any man had, to gratify them; ſince, excepting thoſe of his enemies, who had reconciled themſelves to him, there was hardly one that did are ſtill preſerved, which ſhew a great deal of heat and reſentment in both parties; and what is moſt extraordinary, is to find that ſeveral perſons of the firſt quality in the kingdom, intereſted themſelves deeply on both ſides in this quarrel, inſomuch that the Lord Houghton (formerly Sir John Hollis) was committed, for having, in conjunction with Lady Hatton, framed ſome ſcandalous libels againſt Sir Edward Coke (91). This marriage of the Lord Purbeck and his Lady, as it began with ſo much trouble and diſturbance, became productive of much more; the Lady being accuſed of too great familiarity with Sir Robert Howard, which ſerved to exerciſe the tongues of the multitude for many years (92). The Lord Viſcount Purbeck went abroad in the latter end of May, 1620, under colour of drinking the waters at Spa, but, in fact, as Camden tells us, to hide from the world his being run mad with pride (93). To this man, and to him only, of all Buckingham's family, Sir Anthony Welden gives a good character, and inſinuates, that his wife was ſupported in her bad behaviour, till ſhe drove him mad (94); which is a little improbable, conſidering the proſecutions ſet on foot againſt her for her bad behaviour. Many years after this, Viſcount Purbeck married privately, after her demiſe, the daughter of Sir William Slingſby, of Yorkſhire, by whom he had a ſon, who married the daughter of Sir John Danvers, one of the King's Judges, and obtained a patent from the Protector Cromwell, to change his name from Villiers to Danvers, but he died without iſſue (95).

[U] A ſuccinct account of them in the note.] We can only give the reader here, an account from the records of thoſe weighty and important affairs, in which Sir Edward Coke, as a Privy-Counſellor, was employed. He was commiſſioned, 23d June, 1618, 16 Jac. I. (96), with other Privy-Counſellors, to put in force the Act of Parliament made in Queen Elizabeth's reign, againſt Jeſuits, Seminary Prieſts, and others; and to baniſh them out of England and Ireland, and all other the King's dominions. The ſame year he was alſo commiſſioned with others, in confidence of their approved wiſdoms, fidelities, and circumſpections, from time to time, to call before them all officers, or Miniſter's Clerks, and other perſons, that ſince the firſt of May, in the tenth year of the reign of the King, had any charge, directly or indirectly, in or about the receipt or diſburſement of any of his treaſure; or had any office in or about the receipt or diſburſement of his treaſure; as alſo to view Privy-Councils, and other warrants, orders, tallies, books, &c. to the ſame belonging, in order to diſcover frauds committed by the Miniſtry, in diſpoſing of the public money.

(96) Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xvii. p. 93.

The year after, the King ſignifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. one of his Privy-Council, and others, 2d July, 1619 (97), That whereas by a late commiſſion, dated the 19th of April laſt paſt, he impowered them, or ſome of them, to make inventories and ſchedules of all ſuch jewels, precious ſtones, ornaments, houſhold-ſtuff, and implements, &c. as did belong to his late dear conſort Queen Anne, in her life-time, with their names, faſhions, qualities, and values, and the ſame to ſign, which they had performed. And foraſmuch as he appointed the choiceſt of them to be ſent to the ſecret Jewel-houſe in the Tower of London, there to be preſerved for the honour of the Crown; others to be preſerved for preſents for Ambaſſadors, and others to the cuſtody of Sir Henry Knight, Maſter and Treaſurer of his jewels and plate; and others to be kept at Denmark-houſe, for ornament there, or otherwiſe to be diſpoſed of at pleaſure; and the reſt, being of ſmall value, to be diſpoſed of to the beſt advantage; and a book or inventory being made of the ſame, with their names, faſhions, and quantities, amounting to the ſum of 20,000*l.* or thereabouts. Therefore, confiding in their approved fidelities, wiſdoms, and circumſpections, he commiſſions them to ſell and diſpoſe of the ſame, at ſuch rates and prices, as the ſame ſtand therein valued, or to the moſt benefit and advantage; and the monies ariſing thereby, to deliver into the receipt of Exchequer, &c.

(97) Ibid. p. 97.

He was alſo commiſſioned, 16th July, 1619, 17 Jac. I. (98), to confer with the Deputies of the States-General, touching the differences between the Dutch Eaſt-India Company and the Engliſh Merchants trading to the Eaſt-Indies. And by another commiſſion, dated at Weſtminſter the 29th of April, 1620, 18 Jac. I. (99), he was empowered to put in force certain laws, relating to matters eccleſiaſtic. Alſo by commiſſion, dated at Weſtminſter the 22d of June, 1620 (100), 18 Jac. I. he and others were to enquire into the abuſes touching fines payable to his Majeſty, as well by copyholders as freeholders, on ſurrenders, alienations, and the herriots, reliefs, eſcheats, perquiſites, and profits of courts, waifs, eſtrays, goods and chattels of felons, growing due to his ſaid Majeſty, and being within the ſurvey of the Court of Exchequer. And in another commiſſion, dated at Weſtminſter, 15th July, 1620 (101), 18 Jac. I. he was empowered, with others of the Privy-Council, to demiſe the royalties of the Crown, caſualties and caſual profits, and to ſuppreſs the ſuperfluous number of officers, and for reducing the unneceſſary charge of them. The ſame year the King, on December the 12th, ſignifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. and others, the great offences committed by tranſporting to foreign parts, great quantities of brazen and iron ordnance for their private lucre and gain, contrary to law; and therefore appoints them commiſſioners, to examine witneſſes, on or without oath; and to ſearch into ſuch books or writings, as to them ſhall ſeem convenient, for the diſcovery of all ſuch matters, ſince the beginning of his reign. Such were the ſervices in which Sir Edward Coke was employed during his ſecond return to royal favour.

not fall under the weight of his hand; a few inſtances of which make not only proper, but indeed neceſſary parts of his perſonal Hiſtory. In the year 1619, the chief of the Dutch Merchants in England fell under a proſecution for exporting bullion contrary to law, in the bringing which cauſe to a hearing, Sir Edward Coke was almoſt alone, the Chancellor Bacon being ſuſpicious of the event, from a change in the Attorney-General's conduct; who, though warm in the beginning of the proſecution, grew faint before the trial: but Sir Edward, well knowing the grounds upon which he went, kept his own pace, and would not be either drawn off, or taken down in the management of this buſineſs, which he brought to its intended iſſue, and the ſeveral offenders were fined in the Star-Chamber to the amount of one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; which, as they were very able to pay, this might have been a ſeaſonable relief to his Maſter, if Buckingham, at the requeſt of the States-General, had not interfered, and procured a mitigation (t). The year following the Lord High-Treaſurer Suffolk and his Lady fell into diſgrace, and under a ſevere proſecution for corruption. The reader has been told how that Lord ſtepped once a little out of his way to reflect upon Sir Edward Coke, when upon his knees, upon his coachman's driving bare-headed; but Sir Edward now ſat on the Bench when he came to receive his ſentence in the Star-Chamber, November 13, 1619, and led the way in a long and learned ſpeech, where, after ſhewing how often Treaſurers had pillaged both King and people, he concluded with proving, that by the Earl and his Counteſs the King had loſt fifty thouſand pounds, for which he fined them double that ſum, and impriſonment in the Tower till it was paid: but the Lord Chief Juſtice Hobart thinking that too much, propoſed thirty thouſand, and with him the major part of the Court agreed; but the Earl and Counteſs were committed to the Tower, and their inſtrument, Sir John Bingley, to the Fleet (u). In 1620, the Attorney-General Yelverton, who, when he was Solicitor, had been ſo active againſt the Lord Chief Juſtice, fell under a like proſecution, for having put ſome clauſes into a charter for the City of London, for which he had no warrant; and though his cauſe was drawn to a great length, yet on the 8th of November it came to a hearing, when Sir Edward Coke, whoſe place it was to begin, concluded his long and bitter ſpeech, as a certain author calls it, with a fine of ſix thouſand pounds, and loſs of his place, which the reſt of the Court moderated to four thouſand pounds, diſcharging him of his place by way of opinion, but ſubmitting the ſame to the King, during whoſe pleaſure they alſo ſentenced him to impriſonment in the Tower (w). It appeared clearly, towards the end of this year, that the King's affairs abſolutely required the calling of a Parliament, which was chiefly adviſed by Chancellor Bacon, now become Lord Verulam and Viſcount St. Alban's, who undertook to prepare things for its meeting; and in this conſulted with, and had all the aſſiſtance that Sir Edward Coke (x) could give him; notwithſtanding which, it was very far from anſwering thoſe purpoſes for which it was called. Sir Edward Coke was a member, and his age, experience, and dignity, gave him a great weight there; but it very ſoon appeared, that he was reſolved to act a different part from what the Court, and more eſpecially the great favourite Buckingham, expected. On the 6th of February, 1620-21, there was a great debate in the Houſe of Commons on ſeveral points of importance, ſuch as liberty of ſpeech, the increaſe of Popery, and other grievances; upon which Sir Edward Coke ſpoke very warmly, and alſo took occaſion to ſhew, that Proclamations againſt the tenor of Acts of Parliaments were void, for which he is highly commended by Camden (y). On the 15th of March, complaints were made to the Houſe of Commons againſt the Lord Viſcount St. Alban's, Chancellor of England, in which Sir Edward Coke was of the Committee for preparing the charge, and proceeded mildly (z). On the 5th of May following, Clement Coke, Eſq; youngeſt ſon to Sir Edward, was committed to the Tower for ſome raſh expreſſions that had eſcaped him (a). In the month of July, Sir Edward Coke and his wife, the Lady Hatton, were reconciled by the King (b). The Houſes being adjourned, by the King's command, on the 4th of June, met again in November; and, upon their meeting, the Houſe of Commons fell into great heats on account of the commitment of Sir Edwin Sands, ſoon after the adjournment; which had ſuch unfortunate conſequences, that on the one hand the Commons proteſted, December 18, 1621, againſt the invaſion of their privileges; upon which the King prorogued the Parliament on the 21ſt (c), and on the 27th Sir Edward Coke was committed to the Tower, and his chambers in the Temple being broken open, his papers were delivered to Sir Robert Cotton and Mr. Wilſon to examine (d). On the 30th of December, the King ſent for the Journal of the Houſe of Commons, and tore out the Proteſt with his own hand, as appears by an Act of Council (e) drawn up by his order upon that occaſion. On the 6th of January the Parliament was diſſolved, and the ſame day Sir Edward Coke was charged before the Council with having concealed ſome true examinations, in the great cauſe of the Earl of Somerſet, and obtruding falſe ones (f); notwithſtanding which, he was ſoon after releaſed, but not without receiving ſome very high marks of the King's reſentment: for he was a ſecond time turned out of the Privy-Council, and the King gave him this character: That he was the fitteſt inſtrument for a tyrant that ever was in England; which which might very probably be, on account of his having called the King's prerogative in Parliament a great monſter (g). Some have repreſented him as very inconſiſtent in this; but we want ſufficient lights to judge of this queſtion; and where we find them in others, it never appears that Sir Edward Coke did not know what he was ſaying, or was ever at a loſs to defend what he had done. Notwithſtanding all this we find, that towards the cloſe of the year 1623, the King iſſued a commiſſion to him, with ſeveral others, in which very large powers were given them in the kingdom of Ireland; but it might be very much queſtioned, whether this was a mark of favour and confidence, or a ſtigma of baniſhment and diſgrace: but it is very apparent, that Sir Edward himſelf underſtood it in the latter ſenſe, and yet he was willing to have gone (b) [W]. It may be the willingneſs he ſhewed prevented his going, though other gentlemen, who were in his ſentiments, actually went. He remained firm in his opinions; nor does there appear any traces of his ſeeking to be again reconciled to the Court: ſo that he was abſolutely out of favour at the death of King James. In the beginning of the next reign, when it was found neceſſary to call a ſecond Parliament, he was pricked for Sheriff of the county of Buckingham, in 1625, to prevent his being choſen (i). He laboured all he could to avoid it, in order to which he took exceptions againſt the oath, which he tranſmitted to the Attorney-General; who, by order of the Council, attended the Judges, who found only one objection out of four to be reaſonable, and that was as to the proſecution of Lollards (k), in reſpect to which the oath was amended; but Sir Edward was obliged to ſerve the office, and to attend the Judges at the aſſizes, who had been Chief Juſtice of England himſelf (l). This did not hinder his being elected Knight of the Shire for the county of Bucks, in that Parliament which was held in the year 1628 (m), in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf more than any man in the Houſe of Commons, ſpoke warmly for the redreſs of grievances, argued boldly in defence of the liberty of the ſubject, and ſtrenuouſly ſupported the privileges of the Houſe of Commons (n). In this Patliament he did the higheſt ſervice to his country, not only in regard to his perſonal endeavours, but perhaps the higheſt that was ever done by a private man: for he it was, that, laying hold of a meſſage from the King, propoſed and framed the PETITION OF RIGHTS (o). He alſo, on the 5th of June, 1628, vindicated the right of the Houſe of Commons to proceed againſt any ſubject, how high ſoever, who miſled his Sovereign to the prejudice of his ſubjects, by naming the Duke of Buckingham as the cauſe of all the miſeries of the kingdom [X]. We are indeed told, by the noble Hiſtorian, [W] And yet he was very willing to have gone.] Among other arts that were practiſed at this time, to remove out of the way ſuch perſons as were obnoxious to the great favourite Buckingham; one was, to put ſuch perſons into commiſſions, for the kingdom of Ireland (102), with great expreſſions of royal kindneſs and confidence in them, but with a real deſign to prevent their being troubleſome, by ſending them out of the realm. The truth of the firſt part of this account, will ſufficiently appear, by giving the heads of that commiſſion, in which the name of Sir Edward Coke was inſerted, and his own explanation of the matter five years after, will make good the latter part of the aſſerſion. On the 29th of December, 1623 (103), the King ſignifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. and others, That whereas he granted his commiſſion to his Deputy of Ireland, and others, dated at Weſtminſter the 20th of March, in the nineteenth year of his reign, out of his princely care and deſire to advance the flouriſhing ſtate of Ireland, by the increaſe of trade, ſettling of plantations, &c. he now commiſſions Henry Viſcount Falkland, Deputy of Ireland, Sir Edward Coke, Knt. Sir William Jones, Knt. Sir Edwin Sandys, Knt. John Lloyd, and Francis Philips, to enquire what, and how many pariſhes and churches be in Ireland; alſo how many preſentations, and which are appropriate, and how thoſe churches are ſerved, &c. and to conſider what churches are fit to be repaired or new built, &c. and generally to enquire into all matters tending to the decay of religion in that kingdom; as alſo into the trade and commerce of that nation, &c. Thus far the commiſſion: let us come next to the explication.

In the third Parliament, called in the reign of King Charles the Firſt, viz. April the ſecond, 1628, amongſt other grievances, this of ſending men abroad againſt their will, and thereby into a kind of involuntary baniſhment, was canvaſſed in the Houſe of Commons (104); when Mr. Selden, Sir Thomas Hobby, Sir Peter Hayman, Mr. Hakvill, and others, delivered their ſentiments. Amongſt the reſt, Sir Edward Coke ſpoke to the following effect (105); 'No reſtraint, be it ever ſo little, but is impriſonment, and foreign employment is a kind of honourable baniſhment: I myſelf was deſigned to go to Ireland; I was willing to go, and hoped if I had gone, to have found ſome Mompeſſons there: there is difference when the party is the King's ſervant, and when not, 46 E. III. This was the time, when the law was in its height; Sir Richard Pembridge was a Baron, and the King's ſervant, and at that time Warden of the Cinque-Ports: he was commanded to go to Ireland, and to ſerve as Deputy there, which he refuſed: he was not committed, but the King was highly offended; and having offices, and fees, and lands, pro ſervitio ſuo impenſo, the King ſeized his lands and offices. I went to the Parliament roll, 47 E. III. where I found another precedent for foreign employment: they that have offices pro conſilio, or ſervitio impenſo, if they refuſe, thoſe lands and offices ſo given are ſeized, but no commitment.'

[X] By naming the Duke of Buckingham as the cauſe of all the miſeries of the kingdom.] On the 5th of June, 1628, Sir John Finch, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, delivered a meſſage to the Houſe from the King, importing, That his Majeſty had fixed a day for putting an end to their ſeſſion, and therefore required that they ſhould not enter into new buſineſs, or lay any aſperſion on the Government, or Miniſters thereof. This produced a warm debate, in which Sir John Elliot, advancing ſomewhat that looked as if he meant to touch the Duke of Buckingham, the Speaker roſe up, and ſaid, There is a command upon me, that I muſt command you not to proceed (106). Upon this a deep ſilence enſued, and then the Houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee, to conſider what was fit to be done; and ordered, that no man ſhould go out, on pain of going to the Tower. The Speaker, however, deſiring to withdraw, had leave ſo to do; and Mr. Whitby being in the chair, Sir Edward Coke ſpoke to the following effect (107): 'We have dealt with

Hiſtorian, that, not long before this, Sir Edward Coke had blaſphemouſly ſtyled the ſame Duke our Saviour (p). It is not eaſy to excuſe him upon this head; but perhaps if we had the whole of that ſpeech, the taſk might not be ſo difficult. In all probability this might be in the laſt Parliament of King James, when the Duke of Buckingham took great pains to ſhew, that he brought the Prince back from Spain, and was the breaker of the match, as moſt undoubtedly he was; and for that reaſon grew into as great favour with the people, as he had been with either of his royal Maſters. At this time, if, in the high-flown eloquence of that age, Sir Edward Coke did ſtyle him Saviour of the nation, it might deſerve pardon, though it could not be juſtified. But the noble Hiſtorian himſelf, in the very place where he ſays this, confeſſes that the Duke had been the cauſe of diſſolving two Parliaments, and of ſome violent counſels that had attended theſe diſſolutions; by which, whatever he might intend, he certainly frees Sir Edward Coke from inconſiſtency, ſince the Duke's ſaving the nation, by bringing home the Prince, and breaking the Spaniſh match, gave him no title to proceed ſo far as he afterwards did, towards the ruin of the King and kingdom; and all that can be inferred from hence, in reference to the perſon of whom we are ſpeaking, is no more than this, that he was a very open and frank Orator upon all occaſions; for there is nothing appears to ſhew, that he was not alike ſincere in both his declarations. We may add to this, that whatever he might deſign with regard to the Duke, he could not, by that high commendation, ſeek to flatter King James, with whom the favourite then ſtood upon doubtful terms; and in the laſt caſe he did what he took to be his duty, without fear of incurring the hatred of the favourite, or the diſpleaſure of his Maſter. After the diſſolution of this Parliament, which happened March 28, 1628-9, he retired to his houſe at Stoke-Pogey's (q), in Buckinghamſhire, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in a quiet retirement, univerſally reſpected and eſteemed; his behaviour, in the latter part of his life, having cancelled all the prejudices that had been formed againſt him in the earlier part of it; and there, September 3, 1634, he breathed his laſt, in the eighty-ſixth year of his life, expiring with theſe words in his mouth, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done (r). It is ſaid, that he was perſecuted by the reſentment of his potent enemies, even in his very lateſt moments, Sir Francis Windebanke entering his houſe, in virtue of an order of Council for ſeizing certain ſeditious papers, when he took away his Commentary upon Littleton, and the Hiſtory of that Judge's Life in his own handwriting; his Commentary upon Magna Charta, &c. the Pleas of the Crown, and Juriſdiction of Courts, and fifty-one other manuſcripts, together with his laſt Will and Teſtament, in which he had diſpoſed of his very large fortune in the way he judged moſt convenient, amongſt his numerous poſterity. About ſeven years afterwards, upon a motion made by one of his ſons in the Houſe of Commons, the King was deſired to order all the papers taken by Sir Francis Windebanke out of Sir Edward's houſe, to be delivered to Sir Robert Coke, his heir, with which his Majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to comply; and ſuch of them as could be found, were accordingly ſo delivered; but as to his will, it was never heard of, to the no ſmall prejudice of his family (s). We have now compleated the memoirs of this great man; but there ſtill remains a duty incumbent upon us, to ſay ſomewhat of his public and private character, as well as of his valuable writings. To begin then with his perſon. He was every way well proportioned, his features regular, his countenance always grave and compoſed, and his air and manner of ſpeaking full of dignity (t). He was neat, but not nice, in his dreſs;

' with that duty and moderation, that never was the ' like, rebus ſic ſtantibus, after ſuch a violation of the ' liberties of the ſubjects; let us take this to heart. ' In 30 E. III. were they then in doubt in Parliament ' to name men that miſled the King? They accuſed ' John de Gaunt, the King's ſon, and Lord Latimer, ' and Lord Nevil, for miſadviſing the King; and ' they went to the Tower for it. Now when there ' is ſuch a downfal of the State, ſhall we hold our ' tongues? How ſhall we anſwer our duties to God ' and men? 7 Hen. IV. parl. rot. No. 31, 32. and ' 11 Hen. IV. No. 13, there the Council are com- ' plained of, and are removed from the King: they ' mewed up the King, and diſſuaded him from the ' common good; and why are we now retired from ' that way we were in? Why may we not name thoſe, ' that are the cauſe of all our evils? In 4 Hen. III. ' and 27 E. III. and 13 R. II. the Parliament mode- ' rateth the King's prerogative; and nothing grows ' to abuſe, but this Houſe hath power to treat of it. ' What ſhall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if ' we do, God will not proſper us. I think the Duke ' of Buckingham is the cauſe of all our miſeries; and ' till the King be informed thereof, we ſhall never go ' out with honour, or ſit with honour here: that man ' is the grievance of grievances; let us ſet down the ' cauſes of all our diſaſters, and all will reflect upon ' him.' It ſeems, that the Patriots of thoſe times were either much more in earneſt, or much better diſſemblers, than in others; for we are aſſured, that the Speaker wept very much, while he delivered his diſagreeable meſſage to the Houſe: that many of the members followed his example, during the ſilence occaſioned thereby; and that Sir Edward Coke himſelf ſat down, after he began ſpeaking, to wipe away his tears (108). His ſpeech was ſeconded by Mr. Selden; and at length it was agreed, to frame a remonſtrance to the King, and therein to name the Duke of Buckingham as the great author of their grievances. But while this was in agitation, the Speaker, who went privately to the King, returned, and in his Majeſty's name deſired them to adjourn to the next day; which was agreed (109). But in conſequence of this debate, a remonſtrance was drawn up full of duty and reſpect to the King, as well as zeal and fidelity to the public, in which the Duke of Buckingham, and the Biſhops Neale and Laud, are expreſsly named, as the authors of thoſe calamities which the nation felt at that time (110); and the concern he had in this, was the very laſt public ſervice that Sir Edward Coke rendered to his country.

and his common ſaying was, That the cleanneſs of a man's clothes ought to put him in mind of keeping all clean within (u). He had great quickneſs of parts, deep penetration, a faithful memory, and a ſolid judgment. He was wont to ſay, That matter lay in a little room; and in his pleadings he was conciſe, but in ſet ſpeeches, and in his writings, rather too diffuſe: but whether this was owing to an affectation of learning, to the activity of his fancy, and the ſtrength of his memory, which furniſhed not only a copiouſneſs but a redundancy of matter, or to the error of the times, when this manner of ſpeaking and writing was much in faſhion, is not eaſy to determine (w). He was indubitably a great maſter of his profeſſion, as even his enemies allow; had ſtudied it regularly, and was perfectly acquainted with all the old authors in which the true principles of our laws are found, and with the records which contain the laws themſelves. It was by his ſingular and comprehenſive knowledge in theſe, that he gained ſo high an eſteem in Weſtminſter-Hall, and came to enjoy ſo large a ſhare in the great Lord Burleigh's favour, who never loved ſuperficial men, or raiſed any that were not maſters of the ſcience they profeſſed (x). He valued himſelf, and not without reaſon, upon this; that he obtained all his preferments, without employing either prayers or pence; and that he became the Queen's Solicitor, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, Attorney-General, Chief Juſtice of both Benches, High-Steward of Cambridge, and a member of the Privy-Council, without either begging or bribing. As he derived his fortune, his credit, and his greatneſs, from the law, ſo he loved it with the moſt ſincere affection (y); ſome think to a degree of intemperance: but however that might be, as he maintained the character of a learned and upright Judge upon the Bench, to which he was raiſed by his abilities at the bar, ſo he had no deſire to hide his talent in a napkin, or to conceal the lights he had acquired by his indefatigable reading and extenſive practice. On the contrary, he committed every thing to writing with an induſtry beyond example, and ſuperior to imitation: neither were his writings confined to his cloſet, but ſent abroad into the world, to the great credit of their author; and, if the beſt judges may be believed, no leſs to the benefit of the public (z). More he had publiſhed, if he had not been hindered by his troubles; and more correct thoſe writings had certainly been, that have ſince come abroad, if they had paſſed the preſs in his life-time. As it is, a certain author ſays (a), His learned and laborious works on the laws will be admired by judicious poſterity, while Fame has a trumpet left her, and any breath to blow therein. This is the character of his writings in general; and with reſpect to particulars, they belong properly to the notes [Y]. His whole life, from the time he became a man, was ſpent in

[Y] They belong properly to the notes.] In ſpeaking of the writings of this great man, the moſt natural method ſeems to be, to begin with thoſe publiſhed in his life-time, and conſequently with his Reports; the title of the firſt part of which runs thus:

The firſt Part of the Reports of Sir Edward Coke, Knt. her Majeſty's Attorney-General, of divers Reſolutions and Judgments given with great Deliberation by the reverend Judges and Sages of the Law, of Caſes and Matters in Law, which were never reſolved, or adjudged before. And the Reaſons and Cauſes of the ſaid Reſolutions and Judgments during the moſt happy Reign of the moſt illuſtrious and renowned Queen Elizabeth, the Fountain of all Juſtice, and the Life of the Law.

It appears, from the preface, that theſe were publiſhed about the year 1600; and in the ſame preface, there is an account of the principal reaſons which induced him to publiſh them; which take in his own words. 'I have, ſince the twenty-ſecond year of her 'Majeſty's reign, which is now twenty years compleat, obſerved the true reaſons, as near as I could, 'of ſuch matters in law, (wherein I was of counſel, 'and acquainted with the ſtate of the queſtion) as 'have been adjudged upon great and mature delibe'ration; and as I never meant, as many have found, 'to keep them ſo ſecret for my own private uſe, as 'to deny the requeſt of any friend, to have either 'view or copy of any of them; ſo, till of late, I ne'ver could be perſuaded (as many can witneſs) to 'make them ſo public, as by any entreaty to com'mit them to print. But when I conſidered, how 'by her Majeſty's princely care and choice, her ſeats 'of juſtice have been ever, for the due execution of 'her laws, furniſhed with Judges of ſuch excellent 'knowledge and wiſdom, (whereunto they have at'tained in this fruitful ſpring-time of her bleſſed 'reign) as I fear, that ſucceeding ages ſhall not af'ford ſucceſſors equal to them. I have adventured 'to publiſh certain of their reſolutions (in ſuch ſort 'as my little leiſure would permit) for the help of 'their memory who heard them, and perfectly knew 'them; for the inſtruction of others, who knew them 'not, but imperfectly heard of them; and, laſtly, 'for the common good, (for that is my chief pur'poſe) in quieting and eſtabliſhing of the poſſeſſions 'of many in theſe general caſes, wherein there hath 'been ſuch variety of opinions.'

The ſecond and third part of his Reports were publiſhed in the ſame reign. In the preface to the former, he ſpeaks largely of the excellency of the Common Law, the uprightneſs of the Judges, and of the integrity of its profeſſors. In the preface to the third part, he ſhews, that at the time of his writing, there were no more than fifteen volumes of Reports, viz. The nine Year Books, the Commentaries of Mr. Edward Plowden, and the Reports of Sir James Dyer, Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, with his own three parts of his Reports. He publiſhed his fourth Reports in the firſt year of King James, when he was Attorney-General; and ſo alſo the fifth part of his Reports, which begins with Caudrey's caſe, from whence he takes occaſion to enter into a full and large diſcourſe of the King's Eccleſiaſtical Law; in anſwer to which, there was written a famous piece by Robert Parſons, the Jeſuit, under the following title:

An Anſwer to the fifth Part of Reports, lately ſet forth by Sir Edward Coke, Knt. the King's Attorney-General, concerning the ancient and modern municipal Laws of England, which do appertain to Spiritual Power and Juriſdiction. By occaſion whereof, and of the principal Queſtion ſet down in the ſecond Page, there is laid forth an evident, plain, and perſpicuous Demonſtration of the Continuance of Catholic Religion, from our firſt Kings chriſtened unto theſe Days; by a Catholic Divine, 1606, 4*to.*

Of this book, we have a very high character given by Biſhop Nicholſon (111); but for what reaſon is not eaſy to find out; ſince the whole of it is penned in a high-flown declamatory ſtyle, in defence of papal power and of popiſh religion; for which reaſon Sir in labouring to understand, and in endeavouring to support, the constitution. It is already shewn, that he was a friend to the Church and to the Clergy; and to this it must be

Edward Coke, in the fifth part of his Reports, says, very justly, that it was impossible for him to write any answer, because, as his own was a book of Law and facts, so that of his adversary was a rhapsody of Divinity, History, Canon Law, &c. How competent a Critic the Prelate before-mentioned was, appears from his censuring Camden (112), for calling Sir John Popham, Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, and asserting he never was so, contrary to the concurring authorities of Records, Law, and History. The sixth part of Sir Edward Coke's Reports followed soon after. In the title of the seventh Report, he styles himself Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and it was published in the sixth year of King James; and as it appears by the preface, Calvin's Case, which is that of the post-nati, was reported by order. The eighth part of the Reports was published in the ninth year of King James, and the year following, the ninth part, in which the author takes the same title. In the tenth Report, published in the eleventh year of King James, our author styles himself Lord Chief Justice of England, which is thus qualified in the next part of his Reports, which was published anno 1615: that is, in the thirteenth of King James, viz. The eleventh part of the Reports of Sir Edward Coke, Knt. Chief Justice of England, (of Pleas assigned to be holden before the King himself) and one of the Privy-Council of State. These were all the Reports published by himself. The twelfth part of his Reports hath a certificate printed before it, dated February 2, 1655, and subscribed E. Bulstrod, signifying that he conceives it to be the genuine work of Sir Edward Coke. The title of the thirteenth part is Select Cases in Law, reported by Sir Edward Coke; and these are asserted to be his in a preface, signed with the initial letters, J. G.

There was published, in the year 1607, A Speech and Charge at Norwich Assizes, intended to pass for Sir Edward Coke's; but he clearly disclaims it (113); not but that he did make a speech at that time, and in some measure to this purpose; but these notes of it were gathered and published, without his knowledge, in a very incorrect and miserable manner; so that there was not so much as a single sentence that was not corrupted and maimed in such a manner, as made it apparent to all the world, that it could not be the speech of this grave and learned Judge, but published with a design to prejudice and expose him: in which, however, the authors of that design were by no means successful, the blunders in the book rendering the forgery ridiculous.

(113) See Coke's Preface to the seventh Part of his Reports.

A Book of Entries, containing perfect and approved Precedents of Counts, Declarations, Informations, Plaints, Indictments, Bars, Replications, Rejoinders, Pleadings, Processes, Continuances, Essoigns, Issues, Defaults, Departure in despight of the Court, Demurrers, Trials, Judgments, Executions, and all other matters and proceedings (in effect) concerning the practic part of the Laws of England, in actions real, personal, and mixt, and in Appeals; being very necessary to be known, and of excellent use for the modern practice of the Law, many of them containing matters in Law, and points of great learning; collected and published for the common good and benefit of all the studious and learned professors of the Laws of England, fol. 1614.

As this was a very laborious, so, at the time it was composed, it was a most useful undertaking, compiled with accuracy and judgment, and serving in some measure as a supplement to his Reports. It is true, that, notwithstanding there have been but two editions of this very large collection, it is very far from being scarce, and farther still from being dear: but this ought not to diminish the credit of the work, or of its author, with men of impartial judgments; since this has partly happened from the subsequent alterations of the Law, with respect to practice, and partly from many lesser volumes that have been stolen out of it, and have been accommodated to vulgar use. But when Sir Edward Coke published his book, Entries were more scarce, and he actually laid the foundation thereby of another capital pillar for supporting the great edifice of the Law (114).

(114) See the Prefaces to later books under the same title.

We come now to speak of his Institutes, which are divided into four parts. The first is his Translation and Comment upon the Tenures of Sir Thomas Littleton, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of Edward IV. It was published in the life-time of the author, in 1628, but that edition was very incorrect. There was a second in 1629, said to be revised by the author, and in which the work is much amended: yet very probably that manuscript copy, that was seized amongst his papers at the time of his decease, was still more correct; and if it had been printed, there might perhaps have been less room for the censure of a certain prelate, who was more inclined to remark other people's mistakes than to correct his own (115). The second part of the Institutes gives us Magna Charta, and several other select statutes in the original languages in which they were first enacted, and much more correct than they were to be had any where else. He adds to these a continued Commentary full of excellent learning, wherein he shews how the Common-Law stood before those statutes were made, how far they are introductory of new Law, and how far declaratory of the old; what were the causes of making them, to what ends they were made, and in what degree, at the time he wrote, they were either altered or repealed. The third part of the Institutes contains the Criminal Law or Pleas of the Crown; and therein the author proposes the same end as in his former work, comparing the Statute with the Common Law, shewing where acts are only declaratory, and where introductory of new matter. After explaining the nature of crimes, and ascertaining the punishments inflicted on them by Law, he concludes with the nature of pardons and restitutions, shewing, how far the King may proceed in such matters by his prerogative, and where the assistance of Parliament is necessary. The fourth part of the Institutes comprehends the jurisdiction of all the Courts in this kingdom, from the high Court of Parliament, down to the Court-Baron. In his proem to this part of his work, he modestly observes, that having collected some materials towards the raising this great building, and fearing they would be of little use after his decease, being very short, and not easy of others to be understood, he in his declining years had done what in him lay to advance and perfect his performance. But this not being published till after his decease, there are, as might be expected, many inaccuracies, and some greater faults, which gave occasion to the following work.

When we consider not only the quantity, but the quality of his writings, how they contribute to illustrate, as well the origin as the body and substance of our Laws, explain their nature, vindicate their justice, and demonstrate the benefit of them; how they take in the whole circle of this extensive science, in reference both to its grounds and practice, and how methodically and accurately every thing touched by his pen is treated, we cannot but stand amazed at his wisdom, his diligence, and his public spirit. His wisdom appears be added, that after he had loſt his public employments, and a great Peer was inclined to queſtion the rights of the Cathedral Church of Norwich, he hindered it, by telling him plainly, That if he proceeded, he would put on his cap and gown, and follow the cauſe through Weſtminſter-Hall (b). He was a zealous and faithful ſervant of the Crown in all capacities; aſſerted the prerogative conſidered in a right light, and oppoſed it when either miſtaken or miſapplied. He was an uſeful member of the Privy-Council, while he continued in it; and very ſerviceable to Queen Anne, to whom he was of counſel, and Chief Juſtice in Eyre of her foreſts, as long as ſhe lived (c). In the Star-Chamber he is reputed to have been not only ſtrict and active, but even bitter and ſevere; by which he created himſelf many enemies, who gave him trouble enough, and who, no doubt, would have brought his conduct under public cenſure, if any colourable imputations could have been fixed upon it (d). In his behaviour as a Senator, he ſhewed a laudable zeal for correcting abuſes, an inflexible integrity in purſuing them, and a ſpirit not to be quelled either by the arts or threats of a Court (e). He met with many changes of fortune, was ſometimes in power, ſometimes in diſgrace; and it muſt be allowed, that he made a better figure in adverſity than in proſperity; for, as King James ſaid, he fell always upon his feet; and whatever credit he loſt at Court, he found it made up to him in the country, where he was equally reverenced and eſteemed (f). In the earlier part of his life, he repreſented the county of Norfolk in Parliament; and more than forty years after, he was Knight of the Shire for the county of Bucks, and in that quality ſat in the laſt Parliament he lived to ſee (g). With all theſe great endowments, he was certainly not free from failings, nor are we ignorant what thoſe were reputed to be: for as his character was eminent, ſo it has been drawn by pens very differently affected, and by comparing what has fallen from them, poſterity may come at leaſt pretty near the truth [Z]. His private reſembled his public life, that is, it was checquered with pears in his being able able to examine, acquire, and digeſt, ſuch a prodigious fund of knowledge, and apply it with ſuch diſtinctneſs, perſpicuity, and propriety, as he did, to every point; and though much of what he has written, may through time become of little uſe in regard to practice; yet the utility of it, in reſpect to the underſtanding of our Law, will remain as long as it ſubſiſts on its preſent baſis; and that I hope will be as long as we ſhall continue a people. Viewing things only in this light, it is impoſſible for any impartial reader to avoid paying the higheſt reverence to his memory. But when we conſider alſo, his wonderful diligence in collecting, framing, and diſpoſing, ſo many, ſo laborious, and ſuch different kinds of writing, our wonder muſt increaſe. And when we reflect on the ſtrange returns made him, for the vaſt ſervices done the Commonwealth in this reſpect, and his continuing to the very laſt to proſecute the ſame ſervices, in ſpite of this ill uſage, merely from a principle of public ſpirit, and the ſincere love of his country and its Laws, it muſt raiſe our admiration ſtill higher. Beſides, there are ſome circumſtances yet untouched, that ought to have equal weight with any thing that has been already ſaid upon this ſubject. For he took all this pains for poſterity in the midſt of a life occupied with continual cares for the ſervice of that age in which he lived, when in the full poſſeſſion of the greateſt practice at the Bar, when called to the higheſt offices of his profeſſion, when involved in the perplexity of public employments, as well as when out of them and more at leiſure. We may add to all this, that, from the account we have of the manuſcripts ſeized at his death, there is a very great probability that the world has been deprived of a conſiderable part of his writings, notwithſtanding thoſe we enjoy make ſo great a figure, and place him in a ſphere ſo much ſuperior to any of thoſe who have laboured to ſerve their country in the ſame way. Permit me to add to theſe remarks, which proceed purely from ſincerity of heart, and a real concern for truth and juſtice, that, to his care we owe the reducing the knowledge of our Laws into a ſyſtem, and the putting it in the power of others, to proſecute and improve his plan; for if we compare the Law, as he found it, with the condition in which he left it, and the benefits that have ſince ariſen from his induſtry and example, we ſhall ſee his merit in its true point of light, and have a juſt notion of the reaſons which induced that and the ſucceeding age to ſtyle him the Oracle of the Law, as he really was, and will be, whatever may be the fate of his writings in ſucceeding times; ſince from him were originally borrowed thoſe lights that have led all ſucceeding Lawyers, who, if they had wanted this great guide, would never have been able to have traverſed thoſe paths which led them to knowledge and credit. We live in times, when it is faſhionable to decry, or at leaſt to depreciate, the abilities of thoſe who went before us; and therefore it is the duty of all ſuch as are embarked in works of this nature, to make a ſtand in favour of antiquity, and to vindicate the memories of thoſe great men whoſe actions they record; and in doing which, as they faithfully diſcharge their truſt, ſo they may hope for a favourable reception from poſterity for themſelves.

[Z] Poſterity may come at leaſt pretty near the truth.] In order to obtain the ſentiments of the contemporaries of Sir Edward Coke, concerning his character, we ought to conſider, not ſo much what was ſaid of him in power, for then envy might work and paſſion prevail; but what was thought of him in diſgrace, and publiſhed when he was no longer in a condition either to hurt ſuch as ſpoke ill, or to reward thoſe who ſpoke well of him. When he was firſt in diſgrace, the Lord-Keeper Bacon ſtirred up the buſineſs of his Reports, and deſired that two more Judges might be added to the committee appointed to examine them. Upon this, Sir Edward Coke deſired two things; firſt, that his books might be reviſed by the whole twelve Judges; and, ſecondly, that they might report not only his defects, but what he had publiſhed for his Majeſty's prerogative, the benefit of the Church, the quieting men's inheritances, and the general good of the commonwealth: upon this the affair dropped; the enemies of Sir Edward Coke did not chuſe to truſt him with ſuch a jury as the twelve Judges (116). When he fell under his ſecond diſgrace, and was ſent to the Tower, all methods poſſible were contrived, as well to diſtreſs as to blacken him; his papers were ſeized, and amongſt them ſecurities for money: ways and means were conſulted to exclude him from the benefit of a general pardon, and a proſecution ſet on foot for the old debt of Sir William Hatton; but no imputations could be fixed upon him, notwithſtanding the induſtry of Sir Henry Yelverton, his old antagoniſt; and when a brief was given in the cauſe to Sir John Walter, he laid it aſide, with this memorable ſentence, Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, whenever I open it againſt Sir Edward Coke. Yet he, who ſaid this, was the Prince's Attorney-General: the cauſe however was tried, and a verdict given for the Defendant (117). This, and his care in preſerving Sutton-Hoſpital, or the Charter-Houſe, are ſtrong proofs of his uprightneſs and integrity. The learned Camden, with good and evil. He was unhappy in his second marriage more ways than one; and as the inconveniencies arising from it began early, so they stuck to him to his last breath (b); yet he left behind him a numerous posterity, as well as a vast fortune. By his first Lady he had seven sons and three daughters. Of the latter, Elizabeth died young; Anne

Camden, besides many other occasional commendations, drew his character at large in these words, which follow his mentioning a small rivulet in Norfolk (118). 'The river is anonymous, rising not far 'from Godwicke, a lucky name, where is a small 'seat, but made great by the ornament it receives 'from the famous Sir Edward Coke, Knt. a person 'of admirable parts, than whom, as no one ever ap-'plied himself closer to the study of the Common-'Law, so never any understood it better; whereof he 'convinced England, by his discreet management for 'many years together, whilst Attorney-General, and 'still does by executing the office of Lord Chief Jus-'tice of the Common-Pleas with the greatest pru-'dence; nor has he given less proof of his abilities 'in his Commentaries upon our Laws, whereby he 'has highly obliged both his own age and posterity.' We will next quote his old adversary, Sir Francis Bacon, who in a famous piece of his addressed to King James, speaks thus of our author's writings. 'To give every man his due; had it not been for 'Sir Edward Coke's Reports, which, though they 'may have errors, and some peremptory and extra-'judicial resolutions, more than are warranted, yet 'they contain infinite good decisions, and rulings 'over of cases; the Law by this time had been al-'most like a ship without ballast; for that the cases 'of modern experience are fled from those that are 'adjudged and ruled in former time.' If we should cite all the commendations bestowed upon him by his learned successors in the profession, we might fill a small volume; and therefore it may be sufficient to produce the character entered of him by Sir George Croke, one of the Judges of the King's-Bench, in his Reports, which runs thus (119): 'Memorandum, 'in the Vacation, viz. in August 1634, William 'Noy, Attorney-General, died at his house at Brain-'ford, in the county of Middlesex; and Sir Edward 'Coke (who was Attorney-General to Queen Eliza-'beth, and to King James, and afterwards Chief 'Justice of the Common Bench, and then Chief 'Justice of the King's-Bench, and in 14 Jacobi dis-'charged of that place) died at his house in Stoke, 'in the county of Bucks, in September 1634, being 'a prudent, grave, and learned man in the Common 'Laws of this realm, and of a pious and virtuous 'life.' We will now produce a mixt character of him by an author very little inclined to flatter; speaking of him he says (120), 'Truly he was a man 'of excellent parts, but not without his frailties: For 'as he was a storehouse, and magazine of the Com-'mon-Law for the present times, and laid such a 'foundation for the future, that posterity may ever 'build on; so his passion and pride were so predomi-'nant, that, boiling over, he lost (by them) much of 'his own fullness, which extinguished not only the 'valuation, but respect to his merit; so often is a 'heat, that gives life to noble parts by a circular 'motion, the ruin of them.' Sir Henry Spelman, whose learning was so great, and his character so fair, that his commendation of any man might pass without dispute, in citing the opinion of our author, makes use of this extraordinary circumlocution, That ever honourable Judge and Oracle of Law my Lord Coke himself (121), which sufficiently shews his sentiments of him. After such writers as these, to cite, as might be easily done, many of lesser note, would be so far from adding to, that they might seem rather to diminish his reputation. But there were writers that spoke of him in a different manner. It is very true, and the reader shall hear who and what they were. The famous Parsons, the Jesuit, was one of the fiercest and the loudest (122); he charged him with murdering Father Campion and his companions, to gain credit with the Earl of Essex, in Queen Elizabeth's time; and serving Father Garnet, and his friends, in the same manner, in the days of her successor. But it is well known that these men died by the hand of the hangman for high-treason, and Sir Edward Coke only stated the proofs against them. Sir Anthony Welden (123) has bestowed his dirt pretty plentifully upon his character, which I hope has been already so well wiped off, as to leave little or no stain. The famous Mr. William Prynn (124), though he qualifies what he delivers with many strange compliments and forced civilities, yet bears hard enough upon him in many circumstances, though he knew very well, that the true reason of the imperfections of the book he criticized, was the death of the author before its publication, and either the ignorance or want of care in those who sent it to the press. The renowned philosopher of Malmesbury too Mr. Thomas Hobbes (125), was a great adversary to my Lord Coke, whom he corrects for his errors in Law, with the same air of superiority and sufficiency, that he did the Archbishop of Armagh in Divinity, and Dr. Wallis in Geometry, as being alike knowing, or to speak plainly, alike conceited in all things. As for any more censurers, I profess I cannot tell where to find them, unless I mention one Mr. Jeffs (126), who in the fifth year of King Charles I. delivered a paper to his Majesty, in which he complained of a judgment given by Sir Edward Coke, in the case of Magdalen College, which he affirmed to be treason, and styled him therein a traitor and a perjured Judge: for which he was convicted in the King's Bench, and was set on the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside; obliged to make submission in all the Courts, fined a thousand pounds to the King, and to find sureties for his good behaviour during life. Such were the friends and admirers, such the adversaries and censurers, of Sir Edward Coke; and which do him most honour, being unable to decide, I leave to the judgement of the reader. C.

 [The perspicuity, accuracy, and copiousness with which this article is written, are such as not to leave much room for addition and improvement. Contrary to what is suggested by Mr. Oldys, in note [F], it doth not appear that Sir Edward Coke was ever under obligations to the Earl of Essex, or had any connections with that Nobleman. It is evident, from what we have formerly seen (127), that the Earl opposed our Lawyer's promotion to the post of Attorney-General, and was solicitous to have Mr. Francis Bacon appointed to that office. On one occasion, Mr. Coke gave the highest provocation to the Earl of Essex. This was, by his endeavouring to deprive his Lordship's sister, the Countess of Northumberland, of her jointure by her first husband Sir Thomas Perrot. A courtier being desirous of reconciling the Earl of Essex, to the Attorney-General, Mr. Anthony Bacon was very averse to the reconciliation. In a letter to his great patron, he assured him, that his forgiving of the attorney would, besides giving offence to the Earl of Northumberland, his brother-in-law, not a little scandalize, not only the nobility and gentry, but the whole world, who had no hope of redressing Coke's intolerable insolency but by his Lordship's authority and wisdom (128).

The ferocity with which Sir Edward Coke treated the State Prisoners against whom he was officially called to plead, was undoubtedly a great blot in his character. It was carried to such a height, that it cannot admit of being palliated from the spirit of the times. It excited the odium of his contemporaries, and is one of the things for which he was severely reproached by Sir Francis Bacon, in the letter referred to, in the course of the article.

The distinguishing glory of Sir Edward Coke (his writings as a lawyer excepted) was his parliamentary conduct; especially in the latter part of his life; when he nobly stood up, in support of the constitution and liberties of his country. Indeed, his behaviour, in general, as a member of the House of Commons, from his first entrance into that House, appears to have been unexceptionable, and highly worthy of his cha-

Anne became the wife of Ralph Sadler, Eſq; ſon and heir of Sir Thomas Sadler; and Bridget was married to William Skinner, Eſq; ſon and heir of Sir Vincent Skinner (i). Of his ſeven ſons, Edward, the eldeſt, died an infant; Robert, his ſecond ſon, was knighted, and married Theophila, daughter to Thomas Lord Berkeley, by whom he left no iſſue, dying July 19, 1653, aged ſixty-ſeven (k). Arthur, the third ſon, married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir George Walgrave, by whom he had four daughters. John, the fourth ſon, was ſeated at Holkham, and married Meriel, the daughter of Anthony Wheatly, Eſq; by whom he had ſeven ſons, and as many daughters; but the inheritance deſcending to John, the youngeſt of them, and he dying unmarried, the eſtate came to the heirs of Henry Coke (l). This Henry, the fifth ſon, was ſeated at Thurrington, in Suffolk; and having eſpouſed Margaret, daughter and heireſs of Edward Lovelace, Eſq; left iſſue Richard Coke, Eſq; who, by Mary, daughter of Sir John Rous, Bart. left Robert Coke, Eſq; who by the death of John Coke, of Holkham before-mentioned, became poſſeſſed of that ſeat, and the greateſt part of the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke's eſtate (m). This Robert Coke, Eſq; married the Lady Anne Oſborne, daughter of Thomas, Duke of Leeds, by whom he had an only ſon, Edward Coke, Eſq; and dying January 16, 1679, in the twenty-ninth year of his age, was interred in the church of Tittleſhall, in Norfolk, where an elegant monument, with a ſuitable inſcription, was erected to his memory, by his widow, the Lady Anne Coke. racter as a repreſentative of the people. The Engliſh are to this day greatly indebted to him for the active part he took in ſupporting and procuring the famous petition of right, which, after much ſtruggle, was confirmed by King Charles the Firſt, in the year 1628 (129). The ſpeeches which Sir Edward Coke made, at different times, and upon various occaſions, may be ſeen in the fourth and fifth, but eſpecially in the ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth volumes of the parliamentary hiſtory. In the parliaments which met from 1620, to his death, he exerted himſelf, with great vigour, in oppoſition to tyranny, and in defence of the rights of the ſubject. The ſpeeches delivered by him were not of the declamatory kind, but pithy and ſententious; and almoſt univerſally grounded upon legal precedents. Agreeable to this is an obſervation of Mr. Daines Barrington, that the late publication of the Journals of the Houſe of Commons ſhews, that Sir Edward Coke did not proſtitute his amazing knowledge of the municipal law to political purpoſes, as he generally argues in the ſame manner and from the ſame authorities which he cites in his "Inſtitutes (130)." We ſhall inſert one ſpecimen of his mode of ſpeaking, taken from the debate upon grievances, on the 22d of March, 1627-28. "Dum tempus habemus, bonum operemur. I am abſolutely for giving ſupply to his Majeſty; yet with ſome caution. To tell you of foreign dangers and inbred evils, I will not do it; the ſtate is inclinable to a conſumption, yet not incurable. I fear not foreign enemies; God ſend us peace at home. For this diſeaſe, I will propound remedies; I will ſeek nothing out of my own head, but from my heart; and out of acts of parliament. I am not able to fly at all grievances, but only at loans. Let us not flatter ourſelves. Who will give ſubſidies, if the King may impoſe what he will? And if, after parliament, the King may enhance what he pleaſeth? I know the King will not do it. I know he is a religious King, free from perſonal vices; but he deals with other men's hands, and ſees with other men's eyes. Will any give a ſubſidy, if they are to be taxed, after parliament, at pleaſure? The King cannot lawfully tax any by way of loans. I differ from them, who would have this of loans go amongſt grievances; for I would have it go alone."

"I'll begin with a noble record: it chears me to think of it, 26 Edward III. It is worthy to be written in letters of gold: Loans againſt the will of the ſubject, are againſt reaſon, and the franchiſes of the land; and they deſire reſtitution. What a word is that franchiſe? The Lord may tax his villain high or low, but it is againſt the franchiſes of the land, for freemen to be taxed, but by their conſent in parliament. Franchiſe is a French word, and in Latin it is Libertas. In Magna Charta it is provided, that, nullus liber homo capiatur, vel impriſonetur, aut diſſeiſetur de libero tenemento ſuo, &c. niſi per legale judicium parium ſuorum, vel per legem terræ: This charter hath been confirmed by ſundry good Kings, above thirty times (131)."

Mr. Mainwaring, in the Notes to his Diſſertation on the Compoſition of Sermons, has made ſome ſtrictures on Sir Edward Coke's pedantry. This gentleman, who obſerves, that Lord Coke boaſts, with a ſort of triumph, that he has quoted Virgil three hundred times, has produced a few ſpecimens, in order to enable the reader to judge how far the knotty points, and nice diſtinctions of our common law were rendered more clear to Sir Edward's Auditors by referring ſo frequently to the Roman Poet; and to ſhew the taſte of the age, as well as the claſſic ſpirit of the noble lawyer. Mr. Mainwaring has concluded his remarks with the following character of Sir Edward Coke, in which praiſe and diſpraiſe are diſtributed with an impartial hand. "Lord Coke, however, in the knowledge of the common law, ſtands almoſt unrivalled: but there his knowledge ended; and though it was the only ſcience he was acquainted with, it ſeems to have been the only one which he did not value himſelf for underſtanding. The reader, I believe, will not be offended, if I forget my ſubject a moment longer in obſerving the farther peculiarities of this extraordinary perſon. In his public character, what ſtrange contradiction! At Sir Walter Raleigh's trial how baſe and ſhameful was his conduct! how diſgraceful to his profeſſion, and to human nature itſelf! He did not behave himſelf (to uſe the poor priſoner's words) as became a gentleman, or a man. At the trial of Eſſex and Southampton the ſtrain of his adulation is horrid: he extols the clemency of her Majeſty towards the conſpirators, becauſe none of them were put to the rack or torture; though he well knew, and it now appears from his works, that it would have been againſt law, and could not be juſtified by uſage.—And yet, on other occaſions, this ſame man could look prerogative in the face with the moſt undaunted ſpirit. This he did before his diſgrace; and after he had been taught moderation in the ſchool of adverſity, in many inſtances he ſhewed himſelf a warm and zealous aſſertor of the conſtitution (132)."

Mr. Gutch, in his Collectanea Curioſa, hath publiſhed a ſhort diſcourſe of Sir Edward Coke's, concerning the unlawfulneſs of private combats, written at the requeſt of Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton. Nothing can be more clearly made out, than that ſuch combats are contrary to every principle and rule of the common law of England (133). But arguments of this kind will be of no effect, ſo long as the preſent notions, with regard to what conſtitutes honour and diſgrace, are entertained by gentlemen in general, and by military characters in particular. The practice of duelling can only be aboliſhed by introducing a new ſet of ideas and feelings into the minds of men; and that, perhaps, is beyond the ability of the wiſeſt legiſlator to accompliſh.] K.

of Glouceſter, Bart. He died on the 13th of April, 1707, and ſhe ſurvived him but a ſhort time, deceaſing on the 4th of Auguſt following, and were both buried at Tittleſhall in Norfolk. They had iſſue three ſons and two daughters. THOMAS; Edward Coke, of Longford, in the county of Derby, Eſq; who dying at his ſeat at Longford, in Auguſt, 1733, unmarried, left his eſtate to his youngeſt brother, Robert Coke, who was Vice-Chamberlain to the late Queen Caroline; and in June, 1737, married the Lady Jane, eldeſt ſiſter and coheir of Philip, late Duke of Wharton, and relict of John Holt, of Redgrave, in Suffolk, Eſq. The two daughters were, Carey, wife of Sir Marmaduke Wyvill, of Conſtable-Burton, in the county of York, Bart. and Anne, married to Philip Roberts, Eſq; Major of the ſecond troop of horſe-guards. Thomas Coke, Eſq; the eldeſt ſon and heir of the family, having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſervice of his country, by his conſtant attendance in Parliament, was, on the 27th of May, 1725, upon the revival of the Order of the Bath, appointed by his late Majeſty King George I. one of the Knights-Companions, and ſo inſtalled at Weſtminſter; after which his late Majeſty, in the firſt year of his reign, viz. on the 28th of May, 1728, was graciouſly pleaſed, in conſideration of the merits of Sir Thomas Coke, and of the ſervices rendered by himſelf and his family to the crown, to raiſe him to the dignity of a Peer of this realm, by the ſtyle and title of Baron Lovell, of Minſter Lovell, in the county of Oxford. In 1733, his Lordſhip was conſtituted Poſt-Maſter-General of Great-Britain and Ireland, jointly with the Honourable Edward Carteret, Eſq; which employment he afterwards held with Sir John Eyles, Bart. and with Sir Everard Fawkner, Knt. (n). In 1747, his late Majeſty, as a farther mark of his royal favour, was pleaſed to raiſe his Lordſhip to the ſuperior title of Viſcount Coke, and Earl of Leiceſter. His Lordſhip married, July 2, 1718, Lady Margaret Tufton, one of the daughters and coheireſſes of Thomas Earl of Thanet, to whom his Majeſty confirmed the right ſhe had, by deſcent, to the antient barony of Clifford, by whom he had an only ſon Edward, Lord Viſcount Coke, married to Lady Mary Campbell, daughter of the late Field-Marſhal Duke of Argyle, and who died before his father. Clement Coke, Eſq; youngeſt ſurviving ſon of the Chief Juſtice, married Sarah, daughter of Alexander Rediſh, Eſq; of an ancient family in Lancaſhire, by whom he had two ſons and two daughters (o); but his poſterity became extinct in 1727. Thomas, the ſeventh ſon of Sir Edward Coke, died in his infancy. By his ſecond wife, Lady Elizabeth, daughter to Thomas Earl of Exeter, Sir Edward Coke had two daughters (p): Elizabeth, who died unmarried; and Frances, the wife of John, Viſcount Purbeck, by whom ſhe had no iſſue.
